which became a believer, and was faithful in the use of what had been committed to his stewardship. (Notes, Luke 16:1—8. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) This appeared in whatever he did towards his fellow-Christians, and the ministers of the gospel: and to the strangers, who were driven from home by persecution, or who travelled abroad to preach the word of God. For these had "borne testimony" to his liberal and hospitable love, before the churches of Christ, in different places, especially where St. John then resided: and in continuing to entertain such persons, and in aiding to defray their expenses, from a regard to the will and glory of God, he would act in a manner becoming his character, and honourable to the gospel. Because, from love to Christ, and for the honour of his name, they had gone forth, as evangelists, leaving their native country, friends, connexions, occupations, and temporal prospects, to preach among the Gentiles: determining to take nothing of them for their subsistence, to whatever straits they might be reduced; lest they should appear mercenary, and so prejudice the minds of men against their doctrine. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:15,16,20—27. Acts 20:32—35. 1 Cor. 9:7—23. 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 1 Thes. 2:9—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) It therefore became the duty of established Christians, to entertain such zealous and disinterested ministers and missionaries, and to contribute to their support: that they might be "helpers together with them," in propagating the truth of the gospel, by enabling them to proceed in their work and labour of love.—'The apostle's sentiment in this precept is, that such of the brethren as had not devoted themselves to the preaching of the gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at home, were bound to contribute, according to their ability, towards the maintenance of those who went about preaching the gospel.' Macknight. It is manifest, at the first glance, how exactly this accords to the case of those in this commercial country, who cannot, or do not, become missionaries; and to their conduct respecting those who do.

V. 9—12. Some expositors think, that the apostle here only meant, that he "should have written to the church," had not the report which he had heard concerning Diotrephes, determined him rather to address his letter to Gaius: but it does not appear how the words can admit of that construction. It seems that he had written to the church, to induce them to help on their journey and assist in a manner becoming their profession the persons before mentioned: (Note, 5—8.) but Diotrephes (probably a pastor of the church, whose circumstances, or abilities, or eloquence, concurring with his ambition of pre-eminence, had acquired for him an undue influence over his brethren) would not own his authority, or pay any regard to his counsel. Wherefore the apostle observed, that "if he came" thither, as he intended to do shortly, he would publicly censure his conduct, or even enforce his decision by inflicting some miraculous punishment; (Notes, 2 Cor. 10:1—6. 13:1—10.) as Diotrephes was not afraid or ashamed to vent malicious or wicked invectives and slanders against him, in the most indecent manner. Nay, he did not think this a sufficient expression of his contempt and enmity; but he refused to entertain or countenance those evangelists or missionaries, whom the apostle had recommended; and even forbad others to do it; and when they regarded the apostle's authority more than his prohibition, he proceeded to excommunicate them for so doing!—It is indeed most wonderful, that a professed minister of Christ should thus pertinaciously oppose the aged apostle; and should acquire such authority over the affairs of any church, as to be supported in the disgraceful contest, yet this was most evidently the case. The apostle, therefore, warned his beloved Gaius, neither to be influenced by this ambitious man, nor to imitate his conduct; let him not "follow the evil, but the good;" which was to be seen in the behaviour of professing Christians; for "the man, who did good," and was kind, loving, and beneficent, from evangelical principles, was "born of God," and belonged to him; whereas he who practised evil, had no saving knowledge of him. (Notes, 1 John 3:4—10.)—But while the apostle cautioned Gaius against Diotrephes, he pointed out to him another person of his acquaintance, who was well worthy of his imitation; as he had a good report of all Christians, and of men in general; yea, the very truth itself, as it were, bore testimony to his humble diligence, zeal, and honourable conduct: to which the apostle also added his testimony. And Gaius knew this to be true and faithful: he would, therefore, be sure to honour and imitate so excellent a man.—'Private offences against ourselves must be forgiven, and forgotten; but when the offence ... is an impediment to the faith, and very prejudicial to the church, it is to be opposed and openly reproved.' Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. How many professors of the gospel are there concerning whom the apostle's words may be reversed; so that we must earnestly wish and pray that "their souls may prosper," as their health and outward circumstances do! For spiritual languor, and want of appetite for the spiritual provisions of the gospel, with every other symptom of disease; attended by want of success and vigour, in every thing conducive to the glory of God, may be observed in numbers to bear proportion to their external prosperity. But there are even in these days a few, who are so eminent in grace, and zealous of good works, that the precarious state of their health gives concern to all who love the gospel: and they earnestly desire the continuance of their lives, and the increase of their ability to do good, and that they may "prosper in all things, even as their souls prosper." The conduct of such Christians gives a joy to faithful ministers, which counterbalances their grief on account of those who disgrace their profession: and every renewed testimony, which is borne to their "walking in the truth," renews that inward satisfaction; for the rejoicing of such pastors over their children, and in their fruitfulness and consolation, differs widely from the selfish joy of prosperous hirelings, or that of such as "love to have the pre-eminence."—Parents and ministers should be as ready to commend what is well done as to point out what is wrong, in the conduct of those whom they superintend; and indeed this is far more pleasing to a benevolent mind.—The faithful stewards of Christ, whether they have been intrusted with "the mysteries of God," or with talents of another sort, will at length "obtain a good report:" nor can multiplied charities, or "hospitality without grudging," be so concealed as to remain unknown to the church. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. 6:1—4. 1 Tim. 5:24,25.) Applause properly introduces exhortations and even needful reproofs. (Notes, 1 Cor. 11:2—22.) and indeed it should be considered as an admonition to proceed in the same commendable behaviour.—Ministers and missionaries, who are "constrained by the love of Christ" and of the souls of men, to leave comfortable stations, to rend themselves from beloved relatives, submit to many and great privations, and even that of sweet communion with Christian friends, and abundant "means of grace," to go forth and encounter perils and hardships in spreading the gospel; and who are content to struggle with poverty in "their labour of love," rather than quit their stations, or do any thing to prevent their own success; are peculiarly entitled to the countenance and assistance of their fellow-Christians. Every one, according to his ability, ought to assist such persons, as circumstances require; that "they may be fellow-helpers to the truth;" not as a matter of choice, or as if giving an alms; but as the performance of an incumbent duty, the payment of a debt, the return of gratitude due, not only to God, but to those missionaries who first, by such exertions and privations, brought the gospel into our land; and "who being dead yet speak," and say "Go and do likewise." Indeed that money must be well expended which promotes the faithful preaching of the gospel, in any part of the world: and it is greatly to be wished that all Christians would try to save not only a little, but, if practicable, very much, from their expenses, in order to create a fund for conducting such important designs.

V. 9—14. Alas! we live too much to ourselves in these lukewarm days: and we need not wonder if covetous and ambitious men, who "love to have the pre-eminence" in the church, disdain admonitions from inferior ministers; when even the apostles were not secured from the presumptuous, insolent, and malicious opposition of persons of this description: but their deeds will one day be remembered against them; when "every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he who humbleth himself shall be exalted." Let us then not follow that which is proud, selfish, malicious, slanderous, and wicked; though the example be given by eminent, and distinguished, or accomplished persons; but let us be "followers of God, as dear children, and walk in love," after the example of our Lord, and such as have most closely imitated him: for he, who thus habitually "doeth good, is of God;" and he "that doeth evil hath not seen or known God," whatever his notions or gifts may be. We should therefore notice those, "who by well doing have put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," and who have good "report of the truth itself," and of its most faithful and zealous friends: for by associating with such Christians, and copying their example, we shall have peace within, and live at peace with the brethren. Thus our communications with the Lord's people on earth will be very pleasant, and we shall at length be 'numbered with them in glory everlasting.'

THE EPISTLE GENERAL OF JUDE.

THE writer of this epistle so expressly describes himself as Jude, the brother of James, (Marg. Ref. a. 1.) that we must either allow him to have been Jude the apostle, called also Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, who was brother, or near relation, to our Lord; (Note, Matt. 10:1—4.) or we must suppose the writer guilty of a direct forgery. Some hesitation, however, as to the authenticity of the epistle, seems for a time to have prevailed in the church, which was at length fully removed; though some learned moderns have, on frivolous pretences, as they appear to me, endeavoured to revive it.—He calls himself, not an apostle, "but a servant of Jesus Christ;" and so does St. Paul. (Phil. 1:1.) He is also supposed to quote apocryphal books: but did not St. Paul quote heathen poets, and Jewish traditions, when what was true in them might be adduced to good purpose without at all sanctioning the fables which they contained? (Notes, Acts 17:26—29. 2 Tim. 3:6—9. Tit. 1:10—13.) These are the chief objections: and they amount to nothing against the internal evidence, and the general current of antiquity. It is probable that Jude wrote to caution his brethren against the same deceivers, whom Peter, in his second epistle, had opposed; and nearly at the same time.—Many think that they both had access to some ancient book, which is now lost, and that they quoted from it; and likewise, that Jude had seen St. Peter's epistle: and, in order to add his testimony to the same effect, adopted several of his thoughts, and even expressions. This, however, is uncertain: for the same "Spirit of prophecy" might lead these two witnesses to oppose the corrupters of Christianity, by similar examples, arguments, and illustrations; without either of them knowing what the other wrote.—There is no ground for the opinion that it was exclusively addressed to the Jewish converts: on the contrary, it seems to have been properly a catholic epistle, intended for all Christian churches throughout the world. The exact time when, and the place from which, it was written, are wholly uncertain.

The address and salutation; and the writer's purpose in the epistle, namely, to establish Christians against certain false teachers, who were men of a very bad character, and to excite them to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," 1—4. The example of the Israelites who perished in the wilderness, that of fallen angels, and that of Sodom, are adduced, as showing the danger to which those who apostatized, or perverted the gospel, were exposed, 5—7. The vile character of these seducers further shown, and their doom denounced; with reference to some traditions, concerning Michael contending with the devil about the body of Moses; and an ancient prediction delivered by Enoch, concerning the "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," 8—16. Warnings, counsels, and exhortations suited to the occasion; and a concluding ascription of glory to "the only wise God our Saviour," 17—25.

NOTES.—V. 1, 2. The apostle Jude, or Judas, (John 14:22.) seems to have written this short circular letter, soon after Peter wrote his second epistle; with an intention of adding his protest also against the seducers whom Peter opposed. He styled himself "the servant of Jesus Christ, and the brother of James," namely of James the Less, the son of Alpheus, who was the author of the epistle bearing that name. (Preface to James.)—The unusual ascription of "sanctification to God the Father," and the arrangement of the sentence have induced many expositors to explain "sanctified," of Christians having been "set apart," or separated "in the election of grace," by "God the Father;" in consequence of which they were "given to Jesus Christ," and preserved in and by him from dying in their sins, or falling into fatal delusions, till called, by the word and Spirit of God, into a state of actual fellowship in the gospel of Christ. Others suppose the order of the words to have been disregarded: and then the apostle's meaning is, that the persons addressed were regenerated and sanctified, by the grace communicated from God the Father; that they were thus brought home to the "good Shepherd, who bought them with his blood," and were preserved by his watchful care; and, being "called according to his purpose," they would be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—In behalf of all these the apostle desired that "mercy" to pardon their sins, to compassionate and relieve their miseries, and to supply their wants; "and peace," inward and outward; "and love might be multiplied unto them;" even the special love of God to them with all its precious fruits, and their love to him, to one another, and to all men for his sake. (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Pet. 1:1,2. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.)

V. 3, 4. When the apostle applied himself, with all assiduity and care, to write to his fellow-Christians, concerning that salvation which was common to him and them, and to every man who would accept of it; it appeared to him, on mature consideration, most needful to address them upon the duty of "contending earnestly for the faith," or doctrine, "once delivered to the saints," by the apostles and evangelists, who first preached the gospel after the day of Pentecost. They could not but know the great fundamentals of that doctrine, respecting the Person and salvation of the Lord Jesus, and his mediatorial authority over his redeemed subjects, and "as head over all," for their benefit. And, as these were violently assaulted, they ought to "contend earnestly" for them; patiently and constantly professing the faith, and adhering to the commands of Christ, in the midst of hardships and persecution. They should diligently endeavour, notwithstanding all kinds of opposition, to disseminate the knowledge of uncorrupted Christianity in the world; refusing all countenance to those who opposed it: decidedly using all their influence to put others upon their guard, and to confirm them in the faith and practice of the gospel; and to show them the falsehood and pernicious tendency of the heresies, which were propagated instead of them. Thus their example, profession, conversation, prayers, and improvement of talents, might be instrumental to stop the progress of fatal delusions: to establish the faith of the weak and wavering; and even to recover some of the fallen. And an earnest "contending for the faith," with such weapons as these, would consist with meekness and benevolence differing widely from that controversy which has too often been conducted with acrimony, slander, invective, and reciprocal contempt. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) These vigorous measures were peculiarly proper at that time, as certain men had glided in like serpents, with subtlety and plausible pretences, "unawares," to the people and their pastors: (for the enemy sows these tares, while men sleep:) but the Lord had foreseen them; for they "were of old ordained," or registered, "to this condemnation." Many predictions had from the beginning been delivered to this effect; (Note, 14—16.) and it had been declared, that persons of this character should arise, to invent and propagate pernicious errors: deceiving men, and exposing themselves to the righteous condemnation denounced against lying prophets. Nay, these predictions had been extracts, as it were, from the registers in heaven; even the secret and eternal decrees of God, "known unto whom are his works from the beginning of the world." Such were "ungodly men," who, professing Christianity, took encouragement from the abundant mercy of God, and the way of gratuitous salvation there revealed, to indulge without fear or shame in the grossest "lasciviousness;" thus perverting the most holy truths into an occasion to the vilest unholiness! (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. Gal. 5:13—15.) In doing this they "denied the only Lord God," cast off the yoke of his authority, as their Creator, and that of "our Lord Jesus Christ;" by refusing to have him to rule over them, or to be the subjects of his mediatorial kingdom. (Note, 2 Pet. 2: 1—3.)—Some have supposed that these ungodly men denied the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the person and atonement of Christ; (Notes, 1 John 2:18—25.) and they therefore explain "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness," of some attempts made by them to traduce the doctrines of grace, as tending to licentiousness. But this construction is very unnatural: and the whole epistle shows that they were abominable antinomians, who "wrought all uncleanliness with greediness," under pretence of exalting free grace. It is, however, very probable that they also held some wild notions concerning the Person of Christ; for this was generally the case with the various descriptions of these primitive heretics; whose absurd and presumptuous speculations, concerning these mysterious subjects, would be wholly unworthy our notice, did they not illustrate the folly of man's wisdom, in matters of religion; the perverse disposition of the human heart to prefer any senseless falsehood to the truths of revelation; and the artifice of Satan in suiting the delusions, which he propagates by his ministers, to the taste and capacities of those whom he means to ruin by them. The intellectual poison which he administers, in this age of proud reasoning and skepticism, is of a more specious kind, and can be supported with more plausible show of argument; or else it would not be so generally received. Gave all, &c. Γραφω, without a preposition, is used of those "whose names are written in the book of life:" (Note, Rev. 13:8—10.) and this being generally understood of election, the venerable translators of the Bible rendered προεγεγραμμενοι ordained. This shows what their sentiments were on this subject: but it is not clear, that the decree was here meant, except as connected with the prophetical description. At least, it is not meant, that they were "ordained" to commit these crimes, by any constraint; but merely that their wilful sin and impenitence being foreseen, and God for wise reasons determining to leave them to themselves, he "ordained them to this condemnation;" as he had done Judas, and those who crucified Christ. (Notes, Matt. 26:21—24. Acts 2:22—24. 4:23—28.) V. 5—8. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:1—12. 2 Pet. 2:4—9,20—22.) External privileges, profession, and apparent conversion, could not secure from the severest vengeance of God, those who turned aside from him in unbelief and disobedience. To evince this, the apostle deemed it proper to remind his readers, though they had been taught, and had once understood it; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) that the Lord, having delivered the whole nation of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and having made a covenant with them as his people; yet afterwards destroyed, with terrible judgments, such of them "as believed not," and so would not obey him; though this judgment involved a vast majority of the nation. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 24:1—11. Heb. 3:7—19. 4:1,2.) In like manner, those who apostatized from Christianity, or manifested their unbelief by determined and habitual disobedience; instead of being secured by external privileges, would be more deeply condemned on account of them. Even the angels, originally created holy, endued with noble powers, and exalted to great eminence in heaven itself; when, dissatisfied with "their first estate," they, ambitiously and rebelliously, left the station assigned them by the Creator, had been "cast down" from their holy habitation, and were "reserved," as "in everlasting chains of darkness," wickedness, misery, and despair, "unto the judgment of the great day;" when their condemnation will be as distinguished as the rank was from which they fell. In like manner, the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities, who were favoured with a most pleasant and fruitful country, and with great prosperity; when, after the manner of apostate angels, they daringly rebelled against God, (which appeared especially in their giving up themselves to abandoned lewdness, and the shameless indulgence of their unnatural lusts,) had been exhibited as "an example" of divine vengeance to the whole earth, in the destruction of their cities, and all that was in them, by fire from heaven, and by the perpetual desolations of their fertile country: so that it became a visible emblem of the eternal fire of hell, into which that judgment swept the souls of such as died in their sins; and all the adults seem thus to have perished. (Notes, Gen. 19:24—29. Deut. 29:19—25. Ez. 16:48—51.) In like manner "the dreamers," of whom the apostle spake, vainly expecting liberty and impunity in sin, followed the example, and would share the doom, of abominable Sodom: whilst they defiled their bodies, which ought to have been consecrated to God; despised all authority, divine and human; and reviled those who were placed in dignity, or invested with power, in so insolent a manner, as would tend to exasperate them against Christians in general. (Notes, 9,10. 2 Pet. 2:10,11.) In short, they would not endure either authority or reproof; but disdained them, as the inhabitants of Sodom did the far too gentle expostulation of Lot. (Notes, Gen. 19:6—9.)

V. 9, 10. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:10—17.) It is most probable, that the apostle took this account concerning Michael, from an ancient tradition which was well known among the Jews, and by thus adducing it, he has given an attestation to its truth. (Notes, Deut. 34:6. Dan. 10:10—14,20,21. 12:1.) In Daniel, Michael has been supposed to be the Son of God himself, as the great Ruler over all angels, and worshipped by them all. Yet we do not seem authorized to interpret this text of the Son of God, as spoken of in the tradition by the name of Michael; but rather of some created angel, invested with great authority over his fellows, perhaps as Messiah's peculiar vicegerent. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)—This exalted archangel, however, had a contest with the devil about the body of Moses. It may be supposed that Satan aimed to make the place of his burial known to the Israelites, in order to tempt them to worship him; as the papists do the bodies of martyrs, real or supposed: but Michael would not suffer him to do it; and probably the devil expressed his rage in desperate blasphemy. Yet Michael "durst not bring against him a railing accusation:" he did not presume to denounce on him the judgment of blasphemy, or to retort his revilings; but merely said to him, "The LORD rebuke thee." (Zech. 3:2.) Though the hateful character and atrocious conduct of the devil must have excited the holy abhorrence and indignation of the archangel; he yet dared not to utter any reviling expression: not from fear of the devil: but because, even in those circumstances, it would not have been consistent with the perfection of his character. Yet the heretics, of whom Jude was speaking, claimed superior eminence, as the favourites of heaven, and dared to "speak evil of dignities," whom God had commanded them to honour and obey. Thus they spoke language concerning princes and rulers, which Michael scrupled to use concerning the devil himself: and surely they would not maintain, that they were more privileged than the archangel! or that their rulers were more execrable than that great enemy of God and man! But indeed they "spake evil of such things as they understood not:" for they were men of a base grovelling mind; whose chief attention was paid to the indulgence of their appetites, in such things as "they knew naturally," even like the brutes; and by their excessive and lawless gratification they wholly polluted themselves.—To suppose, as some learned men have done, that "the body of Moses," means the Jewish church after the captivity: because the true church is called "the body of Christ," and to refer the whole to the transaction recorded in the third of Zechariah, merely because "the LORD rebuke thee, Satan," occurs there, may be ingenious; but it is ingenious trifling, which brings no instruction nor satisfaction to the mind. (Note, Zech. 3:1—4.)—'Michael, one of the principal angels, was contented to deliver up the devil, however execrable, to be coerced by the judgment of God: yet these perverse and insignificant men, were not ashamed to reproach "the powers, ordained by God" himself!' Beza.—'The angels have no disposition, and I believe, they have no talent, or faculty for railing: the cool consideration whereof should make all men, especially those who call themselves divines, and especially in controversies about religion, ashamed and afraid of this manner of disputing.' Arbp. Tillotson.

V. 11—13. The apostle denounced a dreadful wo upon these deceivers: for they had "gone in the way of Cain:" who, proudly disliking the humble obedience of faith, and the spiritual worship which God had appointed, failed of finding acceptance with him: and, being enraged by this, he murdered his righteous brother, and apostatized from the religion which he had professed. (Notes, Gen. 4:1—17. 1 John 3:13—15.) In like manner, these wicked men had turned aside from the pure doctrine of Christ, become haters of those who adhered to it, and were about to cast off all profession of Christianity.—They had also run with eagerness and greediness in the same way, which Balaam had taken, in order to obtain "the reward of unrighteousness:" like him they had gone contrary to the commandment of the Lord, from "love to filthy lucre;" they had sought the ruin of JEHOVAH'S worshippers, and they had seduced many of them into licentiousness, and thus exposed them to divine vengeance. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:15,16. Rev. 2:14—16.)—Moreover, as "Korah and his company" had contradicted and opposed the authority of Moses and Aaron, and excited the people to rebel against them; so those wicked men had rejected the authority of Christ's apostles, and contradicted their doctrine: yea, they had induced many others to oppose them; and they were about to perish in their gainsaying, or rebellion, as Korah and his associates did. (Notes, Num. 16:) These were "spots in their religious feasts," in which they met together as Christian brethren; for, feasting with Christians, and indulging their appetites without fear, they would, by that and other scandalous practices, become a disgrace to the whole company. They were indeed "clouds without water," from whom no good could be expected; whilst their own lusts, and Satan's temptation, drove them from one folly and wickedness to another, as the clouds are driven about by the wind. (Note, Eph. 4:14—16.) They might also be compared to trees, which seemed to take root and to give hopes of fruit; but their buddings were withered, and they remained wholly unfruitful: so that they were "twice dead;" as the transient hope which had been given, of receiving life, and taking root, only made way for their being reduced to a more desperate state, from which they could not be expected to recover; for they were as barren trees torn up by the roots, that they might be cast into the fire. (Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. 2 Pet. 2:18—22.) They might also be compared to "raging waves of the sea," in the turbulency, clamour, and violence of their conduct; whilst, by boasting, reviling, and filthy language, they "foamed out their own shame;" and proved to all, who judged by the word of God, what scandalous and abominable characters they were. They were like "wandering stars," whose irregular courses could not easily be described or understood; whilst their appearance, though luminous, foreboded mischief to mankind and "the blackness of darkness," despair and misery, were reserved for their eternal portion; along "with the devil and his angels," with whom they had united in opposing the authority and honour of Christ.—The word, rendered spots, primarily means the tops of the rocks, appearing above the water, which give the sea the appearance of being spotted, and on which ships are wrecked. Thus the disgraceful appearance of these heretics, and the danger arising from them, may be at once exhibited.—The word, rendered "wandering stars," signifies planets: but it may be questioned, whether the apostle used it in the strict astronomical sense; or not rather, according to the popular meaning of it, which best suited his purpose.—The horrible enormities, ascribed to the heretics who are supposed to be here intended, are almost incredible; but, if true, it is by no means proper to speak of them in the detail.

V. 14—16. In a prophecy, delivered by Enoch to the Antediluvians, concerning the coming of the Lord to judgment, men of this character had been predicted and condemned. This ancient prophecy, however, had not been committed to writing, either by Moses, or by any other inspired person; but it had been preserved by tradition, and accorded to the general doctrine of revelation: and it was authenticated, as a part of it, when thus quoted by the apostle of Christ. Enoch, though he lived so soon after the creation as to be the seventh in descent from Adam: (Notes, Gen. 5:2—24. Heb. 11:5,6.) yet foresaw and predicted the second coming of the Lord, even of the promised Messiah, to judge the world; of which the approaching deluge was an emblem. (Notes, Job 19:23—27.) He, therefore, called on the men of that abandoned generation, to "behold" and take notice, that the Lord would come, and was even then coming, with "ten thousands of his holy ones," his holy angels, in the most conspicuous manner. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—33. 2 Thes. 1:5—10.)—Then he would "execute judgment upon all" men: and arraign, convict, and condemn all that were ungodly among them, both in respect of their profane, rebellious, and ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, [l]and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

16 These are [m]murmurers, complainers, [n]walking after their own lusts; [o]and their mouth speaketh great swelling words, [p]having men's person's in admiration because of advantage.

[Practical Observations.]

17 But, beloved, [q]remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

18 How that they told you [r]there should be mockers in the last time, [s]who should walk after their own ungodly lusts.

19 These be they [t]who separate themselves, [u]sensual, [x]having not the Spirit.

20 But ye, beloved, [y]building up yourselves on your [z]most holy faith, [a]praying in the Holy Ghost, 21 [b]Keep yourselves [c]in the love of God, [d]looking for [e]the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ [f]unto eternal life.

wicked works, which they had most impiously perpetrated, in contempt and defiance of him; and of all the hard speeches, the virulent, presumptuous, scornful, blasphemous, and malicious words, which they had dared to utter, from the proud and carnal enmity of their hearts against him. (Note, Jam. 3:3—6.) This conviction and condemnation the false teachers, of whom Jude wrote, could not escape; seeing their works and words were exactly of the same kind. For they were "murmurers;" (after the example of the Israelites, who murmured against Moses and Aaron, and thus showed their enmity to JEHOVAH;) they quarrelled with the truth, precepts, and ministers of Christ; (Note, Rom. 2:7—11.) and "complainers" who were dissatisfied with every restraint aid on them, or authority exercised over them; and also expressed continual discontent with the Lord's providential dispensations respecting them. At the same time, they "walked after their own lusts," habitually making their ungovernable carnal inclinations the rule of their conduct, and disdaining all control. Yet "their mouths spake great swelling words;" boasting extravagantly of their knowledge, liberty, and gifts, as if they were the only favourites of heaven: and they paid court, with abundant flatteries and professed admiration, to such persons as were able and willing to promote their secular advantages, without any regard to their characters; by which partiality, and mercenary servility, they attached proud and worldly men to their party. V. 17—19. (Note, 2 Pet. 3:1—4.) As the deceivers, of whom the sacred writer spoke, were making destructive progress in the church; he deemed it requisite to exhort his beloved brethren, to recollect the words which the other apostles of Christ had spoken, when they first preached the gospel to them; (Notes, 1,2. 2 Pet. 3:1—4. 1 John 4:4—6.) as well as what some of them had written to this effect, especially Paul, Peter, and James. For they had warned them, that under the Christian dispensation there would arise, within the visible church, "mockers," who would treat the most sacred truths, and most important duties of Christianity with profane contempt; and would be a scandal to that holy religion, by "walking after their own ungodly lusts." (Notes, 2 Tim. 3:1—9. 4:1—5. 2 Pet. 3:1—4.) These warnings and predictions related to those persons, who at that time separated from the apostolical churches, to form heretical sects; being "sensual," or natural, unregenerate men, who, "not having the Spirit" of God dwelling in them, as the Author and Preserver of divine life and holy affections, were entirely actuated by pride, ambition, avarice, malignant, and licentious inclinations. It therefore behooved the disciples of Christ to remember their Lord's admonition on this subject, "By their fruits ye shall know them." (Note, Matt. 7:15—20.)

A careful examination of the places in which ψυχικοι occurs, (1 Cor. 2:14. 15:14,46. Jam. 3:15.) will confirm the conclusion, that it signifies natural, that is, unregenerate; without determining into what channel natural depravity was diverted by special circumstances. (Notes, 1 Cor. 2:14—16. Jam. 3:13—16.) It is absurd to suppose, that the apostle would class with these abominable heretics, all those professed Christians who had not the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit: and if that interpretation be set aside, as inadmissible, "not having the Spirit" must mean being unregenerate, not having the Holy Spirit as a Sanctifier. (Notes, Rom. 8:5—11.)—It should be observed, that Jude, as well as Peter and John, appeals to the "word of the apostles," as the standard according to which all ought to be regulated: but this word of the apostles can be found in their writings only.

V. 20, 21. Instead of listening to the deceivers, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren to employ themselves in "building up themselves," and each other, "on their most holy faith."—The doctrine of faith is "most holy" in its nature and tendency: leading men to repent, and hate all sin; to love and obey God; and to lead a sober, righteous, and godly life; by which it may be distinguished from all false doctrines. The grace of faith "is most holy;" as it "worketh by love," "purifieth the heart," and "overcometh the world," by which it is distinguishable from a false and dead faith. Adhering, therefore, to the holy doctrine of the gospel by a living obedient faith; Christians ought continually to be seeking an increase in knowledge of the truths of God, and in the experience of the power of them on their hearts; that they may be more and more established, in a realizing and efficacious belief of them, and in all those holy dispositions, and that obedient practice, which depend on it, as the superstructure rests upon the foundation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Eph. 2:19—22.) Thus the consistency, stability, and circumspection of their conduct will continually be advancing; and they will more effectually "adorn the gospel," glorify God, and do good to men, as long as they live. In order "to build up themselves" and each other, "on their most holy faith," the apostle directed them to continue "praying in the Holy Ghost," or in dependence on his sacred teaching, and under the influence of it; (Notes, Zech. 12:9—14. Rom. 8:24—27. Eph. 6:18—20.) as in this manner alone they could escape the snares and resist the temptations which would be laid in their way. By such a conduct they ought "to keep themselves in the love of God;" in the assurance and comfort of his special love to them, which they could not enjoy if they were slothful; and in the exercise of filial love and gratitude towards him. (Notes, John 15:9—11. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) Yet, with all this assiduity, watchfulness, devotion, and conscientiousness, they must put no trust in themselves, or their own works: but wait, expect, and be continually "looking for the mercy," shown to sinners, by the Lord Jesus Christ; and preparing for the completion of it, in "eternal life," as the gift of God through him. (Note, Gal. 5:1—6.)—Certainly, "praying in the Holy Ghost" does not mean extemporaneous prayer, as distinguished from a liturgy: for both those who pray without a form, and those who read words previously put together, often come short of "praying by the Holy Spirit." But how is the whole of this most beautiful passage enervated, by explaining the words in question of inspiration, or miraculous gifts! Whether with a written form, or without, no man can pray spiritually, except by the teaching and assistance of the Holy Spirit, exciting, in the mind and heart, holy desires, affections, and expectations: and this is wholly independent of miracles, and of inspiration properly so called. All Christians are commanded to pray in, or "by, the Holy Spirit:" but, for at least fifteen hundred years, no Christians have had the Spirit of miracles and inspiration. Have none then, during this period, prayed according to the exhortation of the apostles and prophets? (Note, John 4:21—24.)

V. 22—25. It was peculiarly needful for Christians, in those perilous times, to know how to act respecting such of their brethren as had been seduced by the deceivers above described; and who might probably be recovered. (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5. Jam. 5:19,20. 1 John 5:16—18.) Of some they ought to "have compassion," and to treat them with gentleness, tenderness, and kindness: "making a difference," between those who had fallen through inadvertency, and appeared penitent; and others who were more hardened and profane. The latter they were directed "to save with fear," being cautious, lest by attempting their recovery, they should be themselves entangled; as if a man, being eager to rescue others from a fire, should fall in and be himself burned: or, they ought to use alarming and terrifying methods; as men would do, if they saw any persons in imminent danger of being consumed in the flames, while insensible of their situation, through sleep or intoxication. All endeavours, in this case, must especially be joined with decided abhorrence of the crimes committed by the persons concerned; and care to avoid whatever led to "fellowship with them, in their works of darkness:" even as a garment infected by the plague would be cautiously shunned by those who desired to keep clear of that most destructive malady; or, as the Jews would fear to touch a garment, which might convey ceremonial uncleanness. Thus ought they to "hate even the garments spotted with the flesh;" or whatever had the most remote alliance with the sensual practices and licentious doctrines of these deceivers. (Note, Eph. 5:8—14.)—It has been observed by some writers, that such ornamental or improper clothing, as serves to tempt others to sinful inclinations or practices, or is purchased with the wages of licentiousness, may very properly be called "garments spotted with the flesh;" and, as such, however rich, elegant, or becoming, it ought to be detested and loathed, more than the meanest rags, by all those who would be thought Christians.—But, whilst the apostle gave these warnings and counsels, he showed his readers where to place their whole dependence for preservation, by the form of his concluding doxology. For he addressed it "to him, who was able to keep them from falling," into iniquity, heresy, or destruction, whatever their dangers and temptations might be; and who alone could do it, by his outward protection and his inward supports; and thus, at length, "to present them faultless," fully justified, and perfected in holiness, "before the presence of his glory," when displayed at the day of judgment before the assembled world; "with exceeding joy," to each of them on his own account, and in the felicity of all the rest; to all the holy angels, yea, to the Lord himself, who will "rejoice over them to do them good" for ever. (Notes, Acts 20:32—35. Rom. 16:25—27. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27.) To him, therefore, as "the only wise God," who "knew how to deliver the godly out of temptation," even to "God our Saviour," the apostle ascribed "glory and majesty, dominion and power, both then and for ever. Amen." (Note, 1,2.) He rejoiced that all glory and dominion belonged to him, and would for ever be possessed by him, who alone was worthy of them, and capable of exercising them in a suitable manner, for the good of his universal and everlasting kingdom.—As the Lord Jesus alone will visibly appear at the day of judgment, to "present his saints" unto himself; it has been thought by some expositors that this doxology was addressed personally to him. (Marg. Ref.) But others suppose, that the apostle had the "One true and living God" in his mind, without exclusive respect to any of the persons in the sacred Trinity: as "God is become our Saviour," in Jesus Christ; and the glory "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," in the salvation of believers, will be displayed at the day of judgment; though Christ alone will, visibly and personally, appear to judge the world. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

22 And [s]of some have compassion, making a difference:

V. 1—8. When the servants of Christ address those who "are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called;" and for whom they pray, "that mercy, peace, and love may be multiplied unto them;" they must not only instruct them "with all diligence," in things pertaining to "the common salvation," but select such subjects as more especially suit the circumstances of the times, and tend to put them on their guard against prevailing delusions.—A cordial attachment to the doctrines "once delivered to the saints," and handed down to us in the Scriptures, will render us "earnest in contending for them," and against all innovations, by every means consistent with meekness and love: and a competent acquaintance with them, will put us upon our guard against those "ungodly men, who creep in unawares," amidst revivals of religion, and "turn the grace of God into lasciviousness," by their perverse interpretations and scandalous crimes, through which they "deny the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ," as if they were determined to be their own rulers in every sense, and to be subject to no authority, either human or divine. Thus they bring upon themselves that destruction, which is appointed in Scripture to men of this character.—Whilst we "contend earnestly" for the truths which relate to the Person and Salvation of Christ, we should guard with equal caution against every perversion of them: for, though the infidel or the Pharisee will as surely come short of salvation, as the Antinomian; yet he does not so immediately dishonour the gospel, or in general do so much to set mankind against it. We ought therefore to remind the people not to rest in any profession, knowledge, or experience, which does not bring the soul into subjection "to the obedience of Christ:" (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) for nothing, but the renewal of our souls to the divine image, by the Holy Spirit, can secure us from being destroyed among the enemies of God. We are continually warned of this: and the examples of his severity on unbelieving Israelites, on apostate angels, and on Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record for our admonition; that we should not presume on former favours and present privileges, or take occasion from thence to rebel, or to indulge our ungodly lusts, if we also would not be "bound in chains of darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

V. 9—16. Whilst we are on our guard against "filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh;" let us also stand aloof from those, whether moral or immoral in other respects, "who despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities," and give themselves the license to revile their rulers, in language which an archangel would not venture to use, in reply to the blasphemies of the prince of darkness! When we deem any thing amiss in the conduct of our governors, and wish well to sober, and regular, and peaceable plans of securing liberty, and redressing grievances; let us by no means lose sight of "the meekness of wisdom," but leave every matter to the Lord in the use of proper means. Nay, even if oppressed and persecuted, we should, without "rendering evil for evil," "commit ourselves to him that judgeth righteously."—There always have been numbers who "speak evil of things which they do not understand," and corrupt themselves in such things as they "know naturally like brute beasts." The way of Cain, of Balaam, and of Korah, has in every age and place, been frequented: and enmity against God, concurring with avarice ambition, and sensuality, drives men headlong in similar courses to their own destruction. But when persons of this character are continued in communion with the churches of Christ, they are disgraceful "spots" and blemishes in them; whilst they indulge their appetites and passions without fear or shame; and bear no good fruit, but disappoint all the expectations, which promising appearances at any time excited Such persons, remaining unfruitful after convictions, and under high professions, and so becoming "twice dead, and plucked up by the roots;" often prove like "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame," in virulent reproaches, arrogant boastings, and perhaps horrible blasphemies: they make a glare indeed for a short time, like meteors, and then they sink "into the blackness of darkness for ever." The "men of God," from the beginning of the world, have declared the doom, which will be denounced on all such persons, when Christ shall come "with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment on all the ungodly," for all their wicked works, and for all the impious words, which they have spoken against him, by reviling his truths, servants, providential appointments, righteous decrees, and holy commandments. We should therefore avoid those "murmurers and complainers, who walk after their ungodly lusts," and want a religion to suit such a course of life: and we ought to disregard their "great swelling words of vanity;" whilst we mark, how they have "men's persons in admiration" for their own secular advantage; especially such as are rich, and can afford to purchase at a high rate, flattery, authority, and influence in the visible church.

V. 17—25. We should constantly "remember the words of the apostles of Christ:" and we shall find the Scriptures verified in the profane and licentious scoffers, who separate from those that adhere to the holy doctrine of Christ, and even dare to deride them; and who expect, that the Lord will save them, though they remain carnal, and sensual, and destitute of his sanctifying Spirit. Let us also remember, that the doctrine and faith of Christians are "most holy;" that we may build ourselves on them, in all spiritual and devoted obedience to God; praying for, and by, the Holy Spirit, to be preserved in "the love of God;" and thus "waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."—Whilst with tender compassion, or more solemn and awful warnings, (as the case may require,) we seek to recover our fallen brethren, from dangerous heresies and sins; we should "look to ourselves," and "hate even the garment spotted with the flesh," as afraid of being infected with that most fatal pestilence: and still trusting in him, "who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy;" we should ascribe to him, even God our Saviour, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, all glory, majesty, dominion, and power, now and for evermore Amen.

THE REVELATION OF JOHN THE DIVINE.

It is a singular circumstance, concerning this book, that its authenticity was very generally, if not universally acknowledged, during the two first centuries; and yet in the third century, it began to be questioned! This seems to have arisen from some absurd opinions concerning the Millennium, which were grounded on it by those who maintained them: and therefore their opponents injudiciously and presumptuously endeavoured to discredit their tenets, by denying the authority of the book itself. But it was then too late for the success of such an attempt; and its divine original and authority have been fully established by the clearest and most decisive evidence.—Indeed, the prophecies contained in it have, in so many undeniable instances, been most circumstantially accomplished through a long series of ages, that it stands as little in need of external evidence, as any book in the whole Scripture. No doubt it was written by John, the apostle, to whose name the title of "The Divine" (or the Theologian, Θεολογος) was added some time after; either because of the deep and mysterious truths relative to the nature, decrees, and counsels of God, with which his writings abound; or because he spoke so much concerning the divine Person and glory of the Lord Jesus. (Θεος λογος.)—The book is styled, "The Apocalypse," or "the Revelation;" (αποκαλυπτω, to unveil, or uncover, what was before hidden;) as consisting of matters chiefly prophetical, which were immediately revealed to St. John from Jesus Christ. This took place, when he was in the isle of Patmos, in the Egean Sea, whither he was banished, as is generally thought, by the emperor Domitian, A. D. 94, or 95. Some indeed maintain that this happened much earlier, even during the persecution of Nero, A. D. 67, or 68, or even before that time: but the arguments adduced in support of this opinion are by no means conclusive: and as it stands last in the sacred canon, so it seems to have been written last, and to have been intended to occupy that place. (Notes, 6:1,2. 22:18—21.)—The Revelation opens with the apostle's account of an extraordinary vision, which he had of the Lord Jesus, appearing to him in glory. Then follow seven short epistles from Christ himself, to the seven principal churches in Asia: (Note, Acts 19:3—12.) and after them it contains a series of prophecies, chiefly emblematical, relating to events which would take place, in the church and the nations of the earth, through all the subsequent generations of mankind, to the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the eternal state. This series is sometimes interrupted by explanatory digressions, which will be noted as we proceed: such predictions as are supposed by the author to be already fulfilled, will be compendiously stated with the events to which they relate, according to the judgment of the most approved writers: and an endeavour will be thus far made to render the great outlines of the book as plain as possible to the unlearned reader, whose edification must principally be considered. But in respect of those things, which seem not to be yet fulfilled; a judgment must be formed, and an opinion ventured, with very great caution, and in a very general manner. Many indeed have objected to every attempt to explain a book, so extremely abstruse, and, as they think, unintelligible: nay, some professed Christians, and ministers of the gospel, have even derided these endeavours. No doubt many have affected to be "wise above what is written," and have applied general prophecies by a "private interpretation," in a very unwarrantable manner: (Note, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.) and this should teach others modesty, reverence, and a simple dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, in all their inquiries, whatever helps or advantages they may possess for such investigations. But, if we are enabled to study, write, and read in this manner, there can be no doubt that we shall derive most abundant practical instruction, and obtain increasing vigour to our faith and holy affections, by attending carefully to every part of this most surprising discovery of the Lord's purposes, respecting his church and the world, which was made so many ages before the period of their accomplishment.

They who censure and dissuade the study of it, do it for the most part, because they have not studied it themselves; and imagine the difficulties to be greater, than they are in reality. It is still "the sure word of prophecy;" and men of learning and leisure cannot better employ their time and abilities, than in studying and explaining this book, provided they do it, as Lord Bacon adviseth, with great wisdom, sobriety, and reverence.—The folly of interpreters has been, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, to foretell times and things by this prophecy, as if God designed to make them prophets. By this rashness they have not only exposed themselves, but brought the prophecy also into contempt. The design of God was much otherwise. He gave this, and the prophecies o the Old Testament, not to gratify men's curiosities, by enabling them to foreknow things; but that after they were fulfilled, they might be interpreted by the event; and his own providence,' (or foresight.) 'not the interpreter's, might be manifest thereby to the world.' Bishop Newton.—It should, however, be admitted, that to give the attentive and pious reader a general assurance of the final and most glorious victory, which the cause of God, of truth and righteousness, shall certainly acquire even on earth, for his encouragement, during the triumphs of superstition, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and wickedness, which on every side have hitherto been witnessed, or reported from all quarters, was one most important end for which this revelation was given.—But when even the most learned and respectable men attempt, with particularity and exactness, to explain those predictions which are not evidently fulfilled; it commonly happens, that others oppose their interpretation by some counter scheme, supported also by plausible arguments. And while several are thus engaged, each in defending his own conclusions against those who combat them, the readers in general are perplexed, instead of being convinced; the difference between that part which is fulfilled, and may clearly be explained, and the unaccomplished predictions, seems to disappear: the evidence, arising from the fulfilment of prophecy, as demonstrating the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, fails of producing its full effect; and not unfrequently, the whole is laid aside, as uncertain or inexplicable, seeing the most learned writers advance such discordant opinions on the subject. In most other controverted topics, truth is generally supposed to lie on one side or the other, or to be divided between the disputants: but in this particular, the debates often produce a kind of skepticism in the minds of very many readers; so that they are led to doubt about the whole and every part of it. In order to avoid this, great care should be taken, to mark strongly the difference between what is fulfilled, and what is not fulfilled; and to draw the line between these, as exactly as may be; that the uncertainty, as to the grand outlines, may not appear to attach to those parts, which have already received their accomplishment, but be wholly confined to the other part.—In respect of those predictions especially, which are supposed to be fulfilling in the eventful period during which we live, peculiar caution is necessary: for an unexpected turn in the affairs of nations, may, after a very few years, confute some of the most plausible and confident assumptions of the expositors: and weaken the credibility in the minds of men, even of those interpretations which are well founded. In fact, I apprehend this has been in many instances strikingly verified since these remarks were first written. It does not, indeed, appear probable, that the prophecies, fulfilling in any age, should be clearly understood by the contemporaries; any more than that impartial histories should be written by men of their own times The events, in which our interests, and those of the country or party to which we belong, are deeply concerned, must have such an effect upon our minds, as to deduct from that cool and impartial judgment, which is absolutely requisite in inquiries of this nature. It cannot so soon be known, how the successes and advancement of some and the subversion of other powers may terminate: and till that be known, the application of the transactions of our own age to the events predicted in Scripture must be attended with a great degree of uncertainty. Our nearness to the objects likewise tends to magnify them to us: and we are apt too readily to conclude, that such important transactions must have a prominent place in prophecy. But, I apprehend, that prophecy (especially that contained in this book) resembles a map of the world, on a small scale; in which only countries, and capital cities, and some very remarkable places, are noticed: so that they, who dwell near considerable cities and large towns, are disappointed at not finding them in the map. Thus the events of a century, through a whole continent, or continents, being foretold in a few verses, or at most in a single short chapter, we certainly shall look in vain for many transactions, which appear to us of very great importance. But those who shall come after us, on reviewing the history of the century, or the continent, and comparing it with the prophecy, will doubtless perceive a sufficient coincidence, to enable them to say, "Thus it was written and thus it must be:" yet, probably, they will find this accomplishment of prophecy materially differing from what the most sagacious of us now suppose. Since the author first printed his thoughts on this book, (in 1792,) most extraordinary changes indeed have taken place, in the state of the nations, and of the visible church: which he doubts not will be found accomplishments of the predictions contained in it. Many books also have been written on the subject: several of which he has considered, and means further to consider, and to make such use of as he is able. But he purposes still to adhere to his former plan; and to be very cautious and general, in attempting to explain what has not hitherto allowedly been fulfilled: and merely supplying this deficiency, (if it be one,) by a few quotations from those who have ventured to be more particular. He does not indeed write for the learned. These may and will consult the several authors, who have purposely and exclusively treated on his subject, and judge for themselves: nor has he the presumption to attempt the office of an umpire, between those who maintain different opinions respecting it. The plan and method, on which he proceeds, will appear to the best advantage, in the notes on the several parts of the prophecy: and a general analysis, or outline of the whole, will be more properly introduced towards the conclusion, than at the beginning of the book.—It is worthy of notice, in respect of the Revelation, that the views given in it of God and heavenly things, of the kingdom of providence and grace, of the Redeemer's glory, the happiness and character of his people, with the wickedness and the ruin of his enemies, are set forth, in so striking and peculiar a manner, that even those who do not at all understand the prophetical meaning, are uniformly interested and edified by reading it, in proportion to the degree of their humility, faith, and piety.

CHAPTER I.

The source and design of the book; with a blessing pronounced on those who duly attend to it, 1—3. The apostle salutes the seven churches of Asia; ascribes glory to God; and predicts the coming of Christ to judgment, with the terror and distress of his enemies, 4—7. The Lord declares his own eternity and omnipotence, 8. The place, time, and circumstances of John's vision; with what he heard of the words, and saw of the glory, of Christ; and the commandment given him to write these things to the churches, 9—20.

THE [a]Revelation of Jesus Christ, [b]which God gave unto him, [c]to show unto his servants things [d]which must shortly come to pass; [e]and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant [f]John:

3 [i]Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: [k]for the time is at hand.

4 [l]JOHN [m]to the seven churches which are in Asia: [n]Grace be unto you, and peace, [o]from him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and [p]from the seven Spirits which are before his throne;

6 And hath [u]made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; [v]to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The Lord Jesus, in his mediatorial character, is the great Prophet of the church, the incarnate "Word of God," by whom he reveals himself to men. (Notes, Deut. 18:15—19. John 1:4—9. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) In this sense some things were given to him, "as his revelation," to be through him communicated to his servants, and others were not. (Note, Mark 13:32.) An infinity of the divine designs or decrees remain impenetrably concealed in the mind of God, till the event discovers them; but he has seen good previously to make known some of his purposes respecting future ages, in order to confirm the faith, encourage the hope, and enlarge the views of his people; and that the accomplishment of them, in after times, might demonstrate the truth of the Scriptures to every diligent inquirer. (Note, Deut. 29:29.)—This book was therefore called "The Revelation of Jesus Christ;" because its principal subject is, 'A previous discovery of the purposes of God respecting the affairs of the church, and of the nations as connected with it, from the time when it was given, even to the end of the world.' This "Revelation" was given to Jesus Christ, that he might shows to his servants those events which would immediately begin to take place, and which would all shortly be accomplished: as the transient term of some thousands of years bears no proportion to eternity, in which the whole will at length be swallowed up. These things Christ sent "his angel," one of his more illustrious servants in the world above, to signify and explain, in order, to John, who was his principal servant on earth at that time; as it is probable, that he was then the only surviving apostle. (Notes, 17:7,8. 19:9,10. 22:8 —9,16,17.) Thus, future events were made known to him; as they had been to several of the ancient prophets, especially Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah.—Accordingly he faithfully testified, and exactly recorded "the word of God, even the testimony of Jesus Christ," and all things which he saw in these visions of the Almighty.

The Revelation. (1) Αποκαλυψις. Rom. 2:5. 16:25. 2 Cor. 12:1,7. Gal. 1:12. 2:2. Eph. 1:17. 3:3. Αποκαλυπτω, to bring things concealed to light, Matt. 11:25. 16:17. 1 Cor. 2:10. Jesus Christ signified, or intimated by his angel, to John his purpose of revealing future things to him: but in whatever way the angel was employed, doubtless the immediate revelation was made by the Holy Spirit, and not by any creature.—The angel Gabriel indeed brought a verbal message to Daniel, containing an extraordinary prophecy: (Notes, Dan. 9:21—27.) but the visions and revelations of this book were not verbal messages. (Notes, 9—11. 2:6,7. 4:1 —3. 1 Cor. 2:10—13.. 2 Pet. 1:20,21.)

V. 3. The apostle introduced his testimony, by solemnly pronouncing a blessing on all who should read, hear, remember, and obediently observe the words of this prophecy, of which the accomplishment was at hand. This seems to have been prophetically intended to obviate or answer the objections, and obloquy, and ridicule, which would, in after ages, be raised against the study of this mysterious book, and all endeavours to bring others acquainted with it. Nothing tends more to fortify the mind against the cavils of infidels and skeptics, or the incursions of unbelief, or to produce patient hope amidst trials and difficulties, than the observation and experience of the fulfilment of the Scriptures, in the events which take place around us: an acquaintance therefore with this Revelation, concerning the purposes of God respecting his church to the end of time, when connected with humility, sobriety, and the obedience of faith, must greatly conduce to the Christian's stability, constancy, hope, peace, and patience. It must exceedingly enlarge his views of the great, and glorious, and stupendous plan of the Lord's providential government of the world, as combined with the redemption of mankind; and direct or encourage his prayers for those prosperous days of the church, in which all her tribulations shall terminate, and animate his exertions in the glorious cause. It also must greatly conduce to reconcile his mind to those events, which, though distressing in themselves, form a part of one vast design, already in a considerable measure accomplished, and evidently hastening to an entire completion; to the eternal glory of God our Saviour, the final victory of his cause over all opposition, and the endless felicity of all his faithful servants. Nay, the very mysteries and difficulties of this book are wonderfully, yet inseparably united, with such grand and interesting discoveries of the glory of God, and the work and worship of heaven, as are peculiarly suited to impress with awe, and to enliven and purify, the soul of the humble and attentive reader, even when he cannot discover the prophetic meaning of the passage. Nor is it any objection to say, that many have read it in another spirit, and got much harm by it: for this is the case with other Scriptures; especially with those passages, which may be called "strong meat," being peculiarly strengthening to the faith, love, and gratitude of such as can digest them: though not meet nourishment for babes; and even capable of being turned into a fatal poison by the vicious affections of a proud and carnal mind. (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.)—The reasons which induce infidels and profane "mockers, who walk according to their own ungodly lusts," to deride all attempts towards explaining this prophecy, are obvious; for so much of it has most manifestly been already fulfilled, as must for ever ruin their cause, could the attention of men be drawn to the subject, in proportion to its vast importance: and no part of Scripture more awfully denounces the doom of all impenitent sinners, and all opposers of the gospel. But pious men could never have been led to object to the study of it, as some have done, in strong, nay, rather contemptuous language; had not the misconduct of many in this respect filled them with prejudice, and formed an association of ideas in their minds, which have no necessary relation to each other.—The Lord grant, that the writer and the readers of the present attempt, to render this mysterious book more intelligible and instructive to Christians in general, may rely on and pray for the participation of the blessing here promised, in every part of their progress through it: that, in faith, humility, reverence, and expectation of great advantage, they may read, hear, meditate on, and keep the things which are written in it; "for the time is at hand," when the further accomplishment of them will render them so plain, that they shall no longer be either neglected or misunderstood.

V. 4—6. The apostle, contrary to his general custom, prefixing his name, addressed the seven churches of Asia, or that district of which Ephesus was the capital city. (11. Note, Acts 19:8—12.) The benediction which he used is similar to what has been repeatedly considered, in the epistolary part of the New Testament; but it is here expressed in more sublime and mysterious language, according to the nature of the book to which it is prefixed. He desired and prayed that "grace and peace" might be bestowed on them, "from him, who is, who was, and who is to come;" that is, from the self-existent, eternal, and unchangeable JEHOVAH. The original is peculiar, perhaps unexampled, and almost, if not absolutely incapable of an exact translation; the preposition governing the genitive case of the article, and yet all the subsequent words being in the nominative. (Απο του ὁ ων και ὁ ην και ὁ ερχομενος.) It is supposed to refer to the name of God revealed to Moses; and with a similar disregard to the ordinary rules of grammar. (Notes, Ex. 3:14. John 8:54—59.)—This is here especially meant of the person of the Father. (Notes, 8—11. 22:13. Heb. 13:7,8.)—As "the One true and living God" communicates blessings to sinful man, through the mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the agency of the eternal Spirit: it is almost unavoidable, eye shall see him, [b]and they also which pierced him: [c]and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. [d]Even so, Amen.

8 I am [e]Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, [f]which is, and which was, and which is to come, [g]the Almighty.

under such an economy, to speak of the Father in the absolute style of Deity, and of the Son and the Spirit with relation to their assumed characters and offices; though in language evidently implying a participation in all divine perfections, and coequality with the Father, in their original and essential nature and dignity. Thus "grace and peace" were prayed for, for the Christians addressed, "from the seven Spirits, which are before the throne." This is generally, and doubtless justly, interpreted of "the divine Spirit," with respect to the abundance, sufficiency, and variety of his gifts, graces, and operations; and in relation to "the seven churches," with each of which, and all others, the One and self-same Spirit dwelt, as the Fountain of life, grace, and peace; being omnipresent and omnipotent, and One with the Father and the Son, "God over all, blessed for evermore." (Notes, 3:1—3. 5:5—7.) This manner of expression well accords with the enigmatical or emblematic style of this book; and it is absurd to suppose any created spirits to be joined in this solemn benediction, with the eternal Father, and Jesus Christ the Son of the Father; and indeed it would fully sanction the worship of created angels. (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14.) Finally, this grace and peace were prayed for in their behalf, "from Jesus Christ," as the appointed Mediator, through whom the eternal Spirit, with all his gifts, graces, and consolations, is given to fallen man: and the Saviour was described as "the faithful Witness," who came into the world to bear witness to the perfections, counsels, truths, and will of God to men; and who fully revealed all that he had received from the Father for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, 3:14—16. Is. 55:4,5.) He was also "the First-begotten from the dead." Being "the Only begotten of the Father" before all worlds, and "the Heir of all things," he had come on earth in that character, to tabernacle in human nature; and, having been put to death for declaring himself to be "the Son of God," he arose from the dead, among other reasons, to evince that he was what he declared himself to be. (Notes, Rom. 1:1—4. Col. 1:15—20.) Thus he became "the First-fruits of the resurrection," and appeared as "the First-born" of the children of God, in and through whom they shall all arise again, be manifested in their high and honourable character, and be invested with their eternal inheritance. (Notes, Luke 20:27—40.) Being thus arisen from the dead, and exalted to the mediatorial throne, he is also "the Prince," or Sovereign, "of the kings of the earth;" by whom they reign, to whom they are accountable, whose glory they ought to seek; and by whom all will be terribly destroyed, who oppose, despise, or neglect him. This declaration of the Redeemer's sovereignty over all "the kings of the earth," was a proper introduction to the prophecies which were about to be delivered, of the opposition which would be made to his cause, and his final triumph over all his enemies. (Notes, 11:15—18. 17:9—14. 19:11—16. Ps. 2:7—12. 72:8—11. 89:19—37. Prov. 8:15,16.) Animated with a view of the glory of his beloved Lord, and contrasting it with the vastness of his condescension, and the depth of his self-abasement; the inspired writer broke out in adoring praises, "to him who," great and glorious as he was, "had loved them," when defiled with the loathsome stains of guilt and sin, and when deserving the final wrath of God; and whose love had been so immense, that he had "washed them from their sins in his own blood," which he had willingly shed upon the cross, to make satisfaction to divine justice, and to procure all the blessings of salvation for them. And having, in consequence of this atonement, "quickened them" by his Holy Spirit; he had taught them, in penitent and obedient faith, to purge their consciences from guilt, by the application of his blood; and their hearts from the pollution of sin, by the grace promised through his mediation. In this manner, he had not only "delivered them from the wrath to come," but had also exalted and ennobled them as "kings," to reign with him in eternal glory; and consecrated them as "priests," to be accepted worshippers, and to offer spiritual sacrifices unto "God, even his Father." (Notes, 5:8—10. 1 Pet. 2:4—10.) On these accounts the apostle ascribed unto Christ, personally, the glory and dominion for ever and ever: (Note, Phil. 2:9—11. 2 Pet. 3:17,18) and in thus "honouring the Son," he especially "honoured the Father that sent him:" as all do, who cordially add, Amen. (Note, John 5:20—23.) Some indeed apply the doxology to the Father; but the construction is by no means so obvious and natural.

Washed. (5) Δουσαντι. John 13:10 Heb 10:23. (Notes, 7:13—17. Ps. 51:1,2,7. Is. 1:16—20. Zech. 13:1. John 13:6—11. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 2:14. 3:4—7.)

V. 7. The prophecy of this book principally relates to the opposition, which, in one form or other, would be made to the cause of Christ; the temporary success of his enemies; and his final triumph over them all: and, therefore, at the very opening of it, the reader's attention is called to that great day, when these scenes will be closed, and when all will see the wisdom and happiness of the friends of Christ, and the madness and misery of his enemies. For "behold," with attention and solemn awe, the Saviour who "loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood," "is coming with clouds," or "in the clouds of heaven," in his own glory as Mediator, and in the glory of the Father, to be the Judge of the world! (Notes, 14:14—20. Dan. 7:9—14. Matt. 24:29—31. 26:63—68. Mark 8:38. Acts 1:9—12.) The intervening space would soon pass away, and it might even then be said, "He cometh!" (Note, Jude 14—16.) Then, all nations, being raised from the dead, will be gathered before his tribunal, and "every eye shall see Him," in human nature, exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all divine perfections, who once lay prostrate in unknown agony at Gethsemane, and was numbered with malefactors on mount Calvary! Then, they especially, "who pierced him," shall be compelled to witness his glory, as well as to feel the power of his avenging indignation. (Notes, Zech. 12:9—14. John 19:31—37.) Judas, the traitor, Caiaphas and the chief priests, "Herod and his men of war," Pilate and his soldiers, with all concerned in his condemnation and crucifixion; and those in every age, who, by their infidelity, apostacy, persecutions, heresies, and daring crimes, have "crucified him afresh and put him to open shame," shall then with unutterable terror behold him, preparing to pronounce and execute the righteous sentence of their eternal condemnation. And, as "all the kindreds of the earth," through successive generations, hitherto have combined in opposing, despising, perverting, or neglecting him and his great salvation, with the exception only of a small remnant; so will they at that time "wail because of him," in horror and despair; for neither their numbers nor their power can defend them from his omnipotent vengeance. (Note, 6:15—17.) The apostle, however, assured of the justice of these awful proceedings, and knowing that then the redemption of all true Christians will be completed, subjoined to this awful declaration, "Even so, Amen." "Thus let all thine" implacable "enemies perish, O LORD." (Note, 22:18—21.)

Wail.] Κοψονται. 18:9. Matt. 11:17. 24:30. Luke 23:27.—The word signifies to cut, or smite; (Matt. 21:8.) and is used figuratively for wail, or lament.—"They shall smite themselves," that is, on their breasts.

V. 8. As the Lord Jesus was evidently spoken of in the preceding verse; it is obvious to conclude that "the Lord," who speaks in this, is the same Person: nor can any sufficient reason be assigned, why it should be understood of "the Father" personally; except that men are reluctant "to honour the Son, even as they" ought to "honour the Father that sent him." The whole vision related to Christ, from whom immediately the revelation was given: (Note, 1,2.) most of the expressions here used, or others equivalent to them, are afterwards spoken by him, and concerning himself; and the construction and arrangement of this passage, and the context, would be very intricate, if we were to suppose the Father to be the Speaker.—The Lord Jesus, therefore, here declared, "that He is the Alpha and the Omega," which are the names of the first and the last letters in the Greek Alphabet, the language in which the apostle wrote. This implies, that he is the First Cause and the Last End, the Author and Finisher of all things, in creation, providence, and redemption; "the Beginning and the Ending," the Source of existence, of life, of holiness, and of felicity; and the Completion of them, in every sense, and in all respects.—"Who is, and who was, and who is to come," as One with the eternal Father; (Note, 4—6.) "the Almighty;" the omnipotent and sovereign Ruler of all worlds, by and "for whom all things were made, and by whom all things consist."—No words can more strongly express eternal power and Godhead, than these do. V. 9—11. The apostle next proceeded to relate the manner in which he had received the revelation that he was about to deliver: and he merely called himself "your brother," addressing himself to Christians, without mentioning his apostolical authority, though, most probably, the only surviving apostle. He was also their "companion in tribulation;" being a persecuted servant of Christ, and exposed to the same sufferings in his cause as they were; and a fellow-subject with them of the Saviour's kingdom on earth, and a fellow-heir of his heavenly kingdom. These sufferings he endured, as they did, with that submission, constancy, composure, and perseverance, which Christ required and exemplified; through which he experienced present consolations, and expected a happy event of his tribulations. (Notes, 7:3—17. 2 Thes. 3: 1—5.) He was, at the time when he had these visions, in "the Isle of Patmos," whither he had been banished for preaching the word of God, and bearing testimony to Christ: (Notes, 1 John 5:9—12.) and it is recorded, that he was confined to the mines, and compelled to labour in them, notwithstanding the infirmities of his extreme old age. "But none of these things moved him!" (Note, Acts 20:22—24.) His soul was serene, and at liberty, amidst his sufferings: he had far sweeter comforts, than the emperor or any of his prosperous persecutors could obtain; and he expressed no dissatisfaction or emotion, on account of the injustice and cruelty, with which he was treated.—While in this situation, "he was in the Spirit," or brought under the immediate impulse of the Spirit of prophecy; as Ezekiel, Daniel, and others had been, when favoured with visions of the Almighty. (Note, 4:1—3) This was "on the Lord's day," which can be meant of no other, than the day on which the Lord Jesus arose from the dead, even "the first day of the week:" and it is a conclusive proof, that the first day was set apart, and kept holy, by the primitive Christians, in commemoration of that great event: for on what other account could it have been thus mentioned?—(Notes, John 20:19—23. Acts 10:7—12.)—Being thus cast into an ecstacy, he heard behind him a voice, loud and clear as the sound "of a trumpet," saying some of the same words, which have been already considered, or to the same effect. (Note, 8.) They must here be understood of Christ; and this is an additional reason for interpreting the others of him: and the immediate recurrence of them in this connexion, gives energy to the arguments drawn from them. But if any should still be disposed to understand the foregoing passage of the Father; they cannot but admit, that Christ and the Father are One: for otherwise, how can it be conceived that Christ would have used the same words of himself, which had just before been spoken by the Father, as descriptive of his eternal Godhead? So that, on either interpretation, they are conclusive, in respect to the Deity of Christ.—The voice then ordered John to write what he saw, in a book, and send it to the seven churches in Asia, on which we shall have occasion afterwards to make some observations; (Marg. Ref.) but shall in this place only take notice, that it seems to confirm the ancient tradition of John's having resided and laboured at Ephesus, and in that vicinity, for a considerable time before his banishment to Patmos.—The testimony of Jesus, (9) 19:10. John 19:35. 21:24. Acts 1:8. 1 John 5: 11,12.—In the spirit. V. 12—20. When the apostle had distinctly heard the words which have been considered, he turned to see from whom the voice proceeded: and he then had a vision of "seven golden candlesticks," in allusion to the golden candlestick with seven branches, which was made for the tabernacle: (Notes, Ex. 25:31—40. Zech. 4:2,3,11—14.) and in the midst of them, as presiding over and taking care of them, he "saw One like unto the Son of man." The apostle had been well acquainted with Jesus, when he was on earth "a Man of sorrows;" (Note, John 13:18—30.) and honoured as his peculiar friend: but, while he perceived him in human form, and with some resemblance of his former appearance; he saw him in such resplendent glory, that he seemed quite another person. "He was clothed," after the manner of the priests, "with a garment down to his foot:" perhaps representing his perfect mediatorial righteousness and royal priesthood. This vesture was girt around his breasts with a golden girdle;" which may denote the preciousness of his love, and the cordiality with which he maintains the cause of his people. (Notes, Ex. 28:15—30. Dan. 10:4—9.) "His hairs like wool." and "white as snow," may signify his majesty, purity, and eternity. (Notes, Dan. 7:9—14.) His "eyes, as a flame of fire," may represent his omniscient acquaintance with the secrets of all hearts, and with the most distant events (Notes, 2:18,19. 19:11—16. Heb. 4:12,13.) His "feet like fine brass, burning in a furnace," may denote the stability of his appointments, and the transcendent excellency of all his proceedings. (Marg. Ref. d.) His "voice, as the sound of many waters," may represent the energy of his word, to astonish and terrify; or its invincible efficacy to convert or destroy, as he sees good. (Notes, Ez. 1:15—25. 43:1—5. Heb. 4:12,13.) The "seven stars in his right hand" were emblematical of the presiding ministers of the seven churches, to which the apostle was ordered to write, whom Christ upheld, directed, governed, and managed by his power, and according to his will. The "sharp two edged sword out of his mouth" seems to represent his awful and irresistible justice, in cutting down his enemies on every side, and "slaying them by them by the breath of his mouth." (Note, Is. 11: 2—5.) Moreover, "his countenance was like the sun" at noonday, when it shines most clearly and powerfully, so that "nothing can be hid from the heat thereof." (Note, Ps. 19: 3—6.)—Upon this display of the Redeemer's glory, even his beloved apostle, who had not only "leaned on his breast at table," but had seen his glory on the holy mount, (Note, Matt. 17:1,2.) was utterly overwhelmed with the effulgency of his majesty! (Notes, Dan. 10:4—19.) But the divine Redeemer graciously supported him, and dispelled his fears, again declaring himself to be the "First and the Last;" (Notes, 8—11.) adding, "I am he that liveth:" the ever-living, self-existent God, to whom, as Mediator, it was "given to have life in himself" and to be "the life of men:" (Notes, John 1:4,5. 14:4—6. 1 John 1:1,2.) who had also been obedient to death for sinners. But, "behold he was alive," as the first-fruits of the resurrection, to die no more; to which the apostle seems to have added, "Amen," as expressive of his unspeakable satisfaction. Nay, so absolute was his conquest over the king of terrors that he had possession of "the keys of hell and of death." He possesses the absolute sovereignty, as dwelling in human nature, over the invisible world, the state of separate spirits, and over death and the grave: so that he removes men out of this life, and consigns their bodies to the grave and corruption, when and as he pleases. He then fixes their souls, in happiness or misery, with absolute authority; and he will soon raise all their dead bodies, and either receive them into heaven, or shut them up for ever in hell, as he sees good. (Note, 20:11—15.) None, therefore, of his friends can have aught to fear from any creature, either during life, or at the approach of death; as every circumstance will certainly be ordered in that manner which may best subserve their everlasting advantage.—The Lord Jesus then ordered his apostle to write, First, "The things which he had seen:" namely, the circumstances of that vision

CHAPTER II.

The epistle of Christ to the angel of the church of Ephesus; consisting of commendation and reproof, a call to repentance, a solemn warning, and a gracious promise to those who overcame, 1—7. That to Smyrna, replete with commendation, and encouraging exhortations to faithfulness under tribulation, 8—11. That to Pergamos; in which are warnings against the Nicolaitans, threatenings of judgments on the impenitent, and promises to the victorious, 12—17. That to Thyatira, nearly of similar import, 18—29.

Secondly, "The things, which then were," or what related to the state of the churches at that time: and Thirdly, "The things, which should be hereafter," even the prophecies, which he was about to receive: and this seems distinctly to mark out to us the contents of the whole book. (Note, 4:1—3.)—This mysterious and emblematical vision of the seven stars, was then explained to John, to signify "the seven angels," or presiding ministers of the churches, who were the messengers of Christ to them; (Note, 2:1.) and "the seven golden candlesticks" were shown to represent "the seven churches" themselves; as enlightened by the word and Spirit of the Lord, and holding forth that light to others, by the profession and preaching of the word, the administration of holy ordinances, and their Christian conversation and behaviour.—Keys. (18) Notes, 3:7. Is. 22:20—25. Matt. 16:19.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The revelations of God, by Jesus Christ, were intended to inform his servants about as much of his designs, respecting them and others, through the short period of time, and to the countless ages of eternity, as it was needful and useful for them to know.—Those who are intrusted with "the word of God and the testimony of Christ," must "bear record of all" things which they know; and "declare the whole counsel of God," as far as it is profitable for those to whom they speak. (Notes, Acts 20:18—27.)—While it becomes us to leave "secret things to God," we ought carefully to read, hear, keep, and obey, whatever he reveals: for "every word of God is pure," and "doeth good to him that walketh uprightly." (Note, Mic. 2:6,7.) Even difficult and mysterious passages will be useful to the humble believer, though he cannot fathom the depth of them; and the times may speedily arrive, when the dispensations of Providence will fully illustrate the meaning of obscure prophecies, to the most unlearned readers.—The "grace and peace," which come from the everlasting and unchangeable love of the Father by the communion of the omnipresent Spirit, who dwells in all believers; and through "Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness, the Firstborn from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth;" belong to all those, and to those only, whom he had "washed from their sins, in his own blood:" nor can they sufficiently admire "his love which passeth knowledge," or rejoice in the dignity and felicity, to which he has advanced them; or devote themselves too much to the sacred duties of their royal priesthood; or ascribe too great honour to their divine Redeemer, "to whom be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Amen. This will soon appear: for, "behold, he cometh in the clouds, and every eye" of man, however averse to the sight, "shall see him" placed upon the dread tribunal, from which there can be no appeal. What then will be the terror, dismay, and anguish of his crucifiers, and of all in every age, who have been of their judgment and disposition! and how will "all the kindreds of the earth wail because of him!" while all his faithful followers shall rejoice, and say, "Even so let it be, Lord Jesus: Amen, Amen."—If we would be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting;' we must now willingly submit to him, receive him, and honour him, as a Saviour, who (we profess to believe) 'will come to be our Judge;' for he is "the First and the Last, the Beginning and the Ending," the unchangeable, eternal, and omnipotent Lord, to whom all must be subject, or perish for ever. (Notes, Ps. 2: 7—12. 2 Thes. 4:5—10.) And they, who will not believe him to be the great I AM, and who refuse to honour him as coequal with the Father, will discover their awful mistake, when made to feel the weight of his anger, and the power of that eternal vengeance, which they now despise.

V. 9—20. Those who are brethren to the apostles and ancient servants of Christ, and partakers of their faith and grace, must expect to be "companions" with them "in tribulation, and in the patience," as well as "the kingdom" of their Lord: though few are called to suffer so much, as they endured in this good cause. A peaceful conscience, however, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, will enable the afflicted Christian to be more joyful in communion with God, when immured in a prison, than ungodly men can be in the most prosperous circumstances. If believers are confined, on the Lord's holy day, from public ordinances and the communion of saints, by necessity, and not by choice; they may expect great comfort in meditation and secret duties, from the influences of the Spirit; and by hearing the voice and contemplating the glory of their beloved Saviour, of whose gracious visits no confinement or circumstances can deprive them. The name itself shows how this sacred day should be observed: surely "the Lord's day" should be wholly devoted to the Lord; and none of its hours employed in a secular, sensual, or dissipated manner.—We may well be satisfied to walk by faith, during our continuance here on earth; for could we now see the Lord "as he is," the displays of his glory, even as dwelling in human nature, would overwhelm us: (Notes, Is. 6:1—7. John 12:37—41.) and we must be totally changed in body and soul, before we can bear the effulgency of his majesty, and find unalloyed happiness in that beatific vision. Let us then at present hearken to his voice, lean on his arm, and receive the encouragements of his love to obviate our fears: for what can he, "the First and the Last," even the eternal Son of the Father, withhold from those, for whom he became incarnate, that he might die for their sins, and what can be too hard for him, who has "the keys of death and hell," and lives as our almighty Friend for evermore? (Notes John 14:18—20. Acts 7:51—54. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—39. Col. 3:1—4.) May we then obey his word and walk in his light: may "our light," as derived from him, "shine before men," for their conviction and edification: and thus may we expect the time of our departure hence; which, with every thing relative to it, will be appointed by his unerring wisdom and love; who will come to receive our souls to his presence; and who will at length raise and change "the bodies of our humiliation" also, "that they may be like unto his glorified body, according to the mighty power, by which he is able to subdue all things unto himself." (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:20—28 50—58. Phil. 3:20,21. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1. Many expositors have imagined, that these epistles, to the seven churches, were mystical prophecies of seven distinct periods, into which the whole term, from the apostle's days to the end of the world, would be divided. But there is no proof from Scripture, that seven such periods, and no more, were to be expected, in the state of the church; unless the epistles themselves be admitted as proofs of it: nor are there any distinct traces in ecclesiastical history, in respect of such as are supposed to be already past; though a lively imagination and a prompt invention, may advance plausible things on the subject. It cannot be conceived, if the concluding part of this book itself be recollected, that the last period of the church will be worse than any that has gone before, as the Laodicean church was far more corrupt than any of the rest. (Notes, 20:1—10.) Nor can it be true in fact, that a more flourishing period succeeded that of the church in the apostles' days, or that immediately subsequent to their death: yet the state of the church of Smyrna was far purer and more excellent, than that of Ephesus, nay, perhaps than that of Philadelphia, which on this hypothesis must accord to the Millennium. So that there seems no ground at all for this sentiment, though it has been sanctioned by many respectable names.—But the churches here addressed, were in such different states, in respect of purity of doctrine, and "the power of godliness;" that the words of Christ to them will always be suitable to the case of other churches, and professors of Christianity, in all ages and places, to the end of the world: and some of them contain the proper message or instruction to those of one character, and some to those of another, in all the variety which they contain.—The Lord Jesus himself, appearing in vision to John, directed him what to write to each of these seven churches: so that, in fact, they may be considered as "the epistles of Jesus Christ;" even as those which the apostle wrote by an amanuensis, are called properly "the epistles of Paul."—Each of these was addressed to "the angel of the church," the stated messenger or ambassador of Christ among them. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) It is more natural to understand this of one presiding minister, than of several elders or pastors spoken of collectively, because one in office; and thus it countenances the opinion, which has been advanced, concerning the introduction of a moderate kind of episcopacy in the primitive church, even in the days of the apostles. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5 21,22,24,25. Tit. 1:5—9.) It is also undeniable, that there were several elders, or pastors, in the church at Ephesus, before this time; so that, some ruler, or minister, presiding over the other pastors, must be intended.—The address to "the angel of the church" doubtless implied commendation, reproof, instruction, or encouragement to him personally, and to the pastors in general, on whose ministry and example the state of each church greatly depends: yet the church was principally intended. That of Ephesus was planted by St. Paul. (Notes, Acts 18:18—23. 19:) There is no proof that Timothy ever statedly resided there: (Note, Acts 20:1—6 Preface to 1 Tim.) nearly thirty years seem to have elapsed

3 And [b]hast borne, and [i]hast patience, and for my name's sake [k]hast laboured, [l]and hast not fainted.

4 Nevertheless, [m]I have somewhat against thee, [n]because thou hast left thy first love.

5 [o]Remember therefore from whence [p]thou art fallen, [q]and repent, [r]and do the first works; or [s]else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

6 But this thou hast, [t]that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate.

since the second epistle of St. Paul to Timothy was written; various changes had doubtless taken place in that time: and it was longer since St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Ephesians. John himself is also recorded to have abode at Ephesus, and to have superintended that and the neighbouring churches for several years.—Ephesus was the capital of the province called Asia; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) and the apostle was directed to write the first epistle to the church in that city, as a message from "him that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, and walketh amidst the seven golden candlesticks." (Note, 1:12—20.) This intimated the absolute authority of Christ over his ministers, with their entire dependence on him; and his constant, though invisible presence with his churches, in which he had fixed the light of his word and ordinances; (Note, Matt. 28:19,20.) his attention to their whole conduct; his readiness to help and bless them, whilst they made a proper use of their light; and his power and purpose to remove it, if provoked by their perversion or neglect of it.—They shine by his light, and are absolutely under his control, and at his disposal.

V. 2—5. Our Lord reminded the presiding minister at Ephesus, and by him all the church, that he knew, or observed and accepted, their "works of faith and love," (Marg. Ref. e.) the labour which they bestowed in his service, their "patient continuance in well doing," under heavy trials and afflictions; and their decided abhorrence of false teachers and evil workers, whom they would not on any account endure in their communion. He had likewise noticed, with approbation, the trial which they had made of certain persons, who confidently claimed apostolical authority, as if immediately commissioned by Christ himself, and had thus attempted to draw them off from "the faith once delivered to the saints;" and how they had found them out to be impostors. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 1 John 4:1—3. 2 John 7—11.) They had also repeatedly endured affliction, and exercised patience in the cause of Christ; and he repeatedly took a kind notice of it, and of their persevering labours, without wearying or fainting, from a regard to his name. (Notes, Prov. 24:10. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Gal. 6:6—10. 2 Thes. 3:13.) Nevertheless, he had somewhat to allege against them; because the fervency of their love to him, and their zeal for his glory had sensibly declined, since they first embraced Christianity; and they had become more negligent and formal than they used to be. This abatement of holy affection naturally tended to still more apparent and evident evil: the Lord therefore called on them to recollect, how lively, zealous, fervent, united, and active they had been; and to compare their present fallen condition with it; that thus they might be excited to "repent and do their first works." Else he would come, by his providence, in a short time and an unexpected manner, and "remove their candlestick out of its place;" or deprive them of the light of the gospel, and the advantage of its ordinances: nor could this judgment be averted without "repentance and works meet for repentance."—This sentence was after a time most awfully executed: and at this day, Ephesus, which was so renowned a city, is an inconsiderable village, in which there are none who so much as bear the Christian name.—There is some difficulty in conceiving, how the persevering diligence and patience of this church, could consist with that abatement in love, with which it is charged. But observation and experience combine to prove, that in many instances, while the affections are lively and fervent, men engage zealously in services, and form habits of exertion, self-denial, patience, and courageous disregard to opposition and reproach; in which, as to the outward conduct at least, they persevere, from various motives, and often conscientiously; though it is lamentably true, and they know it, that their hearts are not so thoroughly engaged in what they do, as they once were. Many are well aware, that this is their case: they have zeal enough to retain them, in their former course of active service, which is become habitual, and in some circles creditable: but had they not been more "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," in former days, those habits would never have been formed, those services had never been engaged in. Perhaps most Christians are too apt to take encouragement from such diligence, and to silence the remonstrances of their consciences by it: but it is plain, that our Saviour and Judge considers this as a very criminal state of heart and conduct.

Bear. V. 6, 7. The Ephesian church, though declined in love, was not corrupted with licentious principles, or immoral practices, but hated and detested "the deeds of the Nicolaitanes," which Christ also abhorred. This, as it will be shown presently, was a sect of avowed and most abominable Antinomians. (Notes, 14—16. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:1—9.)—But, whilst these things were immediately addressed to the rulers, pastors, and church at Ephesus; every person in all other places, and in all future ages, "who had an ear," and could perceive the meaning of the words, was concerned to attend to them; and to all those things, which the Holy Spirit (by whose agency, the apostle had this vision of Christ speaking to him) thus declared unto the churches. (Note, 1:1,2.)—This is a most emphatical call to ministers and Christians, in every age, carefully and diligently to study these epistles to the churches; as replete with most important instruction, not only to those immediately addressed, but to all others, "even to the end of the world." (Marg. Ref. a.)—After this solemn introduction the Lord Jesus promised to every man, who, by faith in him, should overcome the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil; (Notes, 1 John 4:4—6. 5:4,5.) and especially those, to which his peculiar disposition or circumstances most exposed him; that he would give "him to eat of the Tree of life."—This is a figurative expression taken from the account of the garden of Eden (Notes, Gen. 2:8,9. 3:22—24.) and denoting the pure, satisfactory, and eternal joys of heaven; and the anticipation of them in this world, by faith, communion with Christ, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit. (Notes, 22:2—5. Ez. 47 12.) Every victory over sharp temptation would be graciously rewarded with foretastes of this fruit; and the final victory, with the eternal fruition of the happiness intended by it, in heaven itself, and in the presence and love of God (Notes, 10,11,17,26—28. 3:4—6,12,13,20—22. 7:9—12.)

V. 8, 9. Smyrna was a large city to the north of Ephesus The epistle sent to "the angel of the church" established there, was the message of him, who is "the First and the Last." (Note, 1:8—11.) These words were spoken by JEHOVAH of himself, when declaring his own eternal Deity and asserting "that beside him there was no God, yea, he knew not any:" (Note, Is. 44:6—8.) so that the repeated use of them by the Lord Jesus must be allowed by all, who reverence the words of the prophets and apostles, to be a full proof, that he is the self-existent and eternal God. And, as the distinction between the Father and the Son is every where established whilst it is declared that there is but "one living and true God:" it might easily be proved in form, that there can be no consistent alternative, between rejecting the Bible, or denying it to be the unerring word of God, and acknowledging a plurality of Persons in the Unity of the Godhead. For the same has repeatedly been shown concerning the Holy Spirit, in respect of the attributes and operations peculiar to Deity and his distinct personal subsistence. (Notes, John 14:15—17. 16:8—13. 1 Cor. 2:10—13. 3:16,17. 12:4—11.) Thus the doctrine of the Trinity is fixed on the firm basis of divine revelation: and it will always be found, that no other scheme however modified, can be supported by any learning, ingenuity, or diligence of man, except with a proportionable disregard to the oracles of God: and the full establishment of such doctrine must be the effect of a total disbelief of the Scriptures, in respect of the nature, subsistence, and perfections of the Godhead. The church, indeed, as built on the Pe-son of Christ, cannot be subverted by "the gates of hell:" (Note, Matt. 16:18.) and though we may well be concerned for our children, and the cause of the gospel in these lands; and should therefore use every proper method of "earnestly contending for the truth once delivered to the saints:" yet we may be free from anxiety about the event of the contest, and predict, that the triumphing of those, who strive against "the First and the Last," will assuredly be short.—He who thus asserted his own essential Deity, in the same place gave an intimation of his incarnation, death, resurrection, and everlasting intercession: (1:18.) and, in the character of the omnipotent Friend and Saviour of his people, he assured the Christians at Smyrna, that he noticed and accepted their works, and was well acquainted with their trials and poverty: for though Smyrna was a rich and populous city; either the poorest of the inhabitants alone had been converted, or the Christians there had been impoverished by persecution. They were indeed poor in the world, as well as "poor in spirit;" (Notes, Matt. 5:3. Jam. 1:9—11.) yet Christ declared, "that they were rich in faith," and by an interest in his "unsearchable riches," and the precious promises of the new covenant; rich in wisdom, grace, and good works, and as heirs of an unfailing treasure in heaven: (Notes, 3:17. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. Jam. 2:5—7.) for they were in a very flourishing state in respect of their souls, though greatly reduced in their outward circumstances. (Note, 3 John 1—4.)—Moreover, he knew the blasphemy of certain persons, who "said they were Jews," and reviled both them and him. Some think that these men professed Christianity: but in their zeal for the Mosaic law, they spoke such things of the Person and righteousness of Christ, as amounted to constructive blasphemy: but it is more obvious to conclude, that they were virulent opposers and persecutors, who "contradicted and blasphemed," as the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia had done, at the time when St. Paul preached among them. (Acts 13:45.) They professed to be Jews, and the people and worshippers of God; but they were not what they professed to be. Whether they were of the Jewish nation or not, God did not allow of them as his congregation; the rites for which they contended were no longer of any validity; their worship was carnal and hypocritical; they violently opposed the truth and cause of God: and they were in fact "the synagogue of Satan," a company of people, bearing the image, copying the example, doing the works, and combining together to support the kingdom of the devil. (Notes, 3:8,9. John 8:41—47.)

V. 10, 11. These concluding verses intimate that the persons above mentioned were fierce persecutors, and not subtle deceivers: for Christ did not warn his people to beware of false doctrine; but to prepare for the cross. He exhorted them "to fear none of those things which they should suffer:" for he, "the First and the Last," was able to protect, support, comfort, uphold, and deliver them. Yet, behold, he saw good to permit the devil to prevail so far, that he would cast some of them into prison, by means of "his synagogue" of professed Jews, who probably stirred up the people and magistrates against them. Their enemies meant that they should thus be destroyed; but their Lord and Saviour permitted it, that they might be tried, and proved, and purified. (Notes, Dan. 12:10. Zech. 13:8,9. Mal. 3:1—4. Jam. 1:2—5. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) For this purpose they would have "tribulation ten days." This may either mean ten years, which is recorded to have been the duration of Domitian's persecution; or a considerable but limited time; during which space, many of them might be called to suffer martyrdom for the truth. The Lord therefore exhorted them to be "faithful unto death;" maintaining their allegiance to him inviolable, fighting valiantly as his soldiers, and adhering to his truth and will, even if called to suffer death for his sake; or in any case, till the close of their lives. And then he "who had been dead, and was alive," would recompense them, as no other prince or captain could do his faithful adherents; for he would give them "a crown of life," or eternal glory and felicity. (Notes, Acts 7:54—60. Jam. 1:12.)—This epistle also concerned all who could hear and understand, as no one, who conquered in this spiritual warfare, should be hurt by "the second death;" though he might die in winning the battle. But he, "who hath the keys of hell and death," engaged to secure the souls of his servants, at the time of their dissolution, and their bodies at the resurrection; that they should not be finally separated from God, or sent away into the everlasting punishment, prepared for all wicked men; which is emphatically called "the second death:" on the contrary they would be preserved from every degree of this misery, and receive the gift of eternal felicity, after their transient sufferings in this world. (Notes, 20:4—6,11—15.)—Nothing of reproof or warning is contained in this epistle and it is remarkable, that there are more Christians at this day in Smyrna, than at any other place in all that part of the world: the candlestick has not wholly been removed from them; but some glimmerings of light are still continued to the harassed remnant of this church.—The devil, &c. (10) Notes, 12:7—12. 13:8—10. 20:1—3,7—10. 2 Tim. 4:16—18. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.

V. 12, 13. This epistle, "to the angel of the church in Pergamos," (a city to the north of Smyrna,) contains both reproof and threatenings; and therefore it was sent as from him, "who hath the sharp sword with two edges." (Notes, 14—16. 1:16. 19:11—16. Is. 11:2—5.)—The Lord Jesus Christ took favourable notice of the works of the Christians in this city, as far as they were obedient to his commandments; and he reminded them, that he knew their habitation to be in a place, where Satan had especially established his throne, and taken up his abode. This must denote, that Pergamos was not only a very wicked city in other respects, but also that it was, as it were, the headquarters of both persecution and heresy; the two principal engines of the devil, in opposing the pure gospel of Christ: and that from thence these dir evils diffused their baleful influence to other cities. (Note, Acts 20:29—31.) Yet, even in this perilous situation, the church in general held fast and professed the truth of the gospel, and a zealous regard to the honour and authority of Christ: so that they had not "denied the faith," either by open apostacy, or by temporizing to avoid the cross; not even in those trying days, in which Antipas (who probably was a pastor of the church) had been a faithful witness to the truth of Christ, and had been slain for his testimony, by those among whom Satan dwelt.—'Ecclesiastical history has not informed us, who this Antipas was.—Perhaps he was some zealous minister; ... or some private Christian of obscure birth, rank, and circumstances, ennobled by enduring martyrdom in the Christian cause. ... This condescending notice taken of him by his divine Master, ... would ... animate the courage and fidelity of other Christians, who might be called out to like extremities.' Doddridge.

V. 14—16. The Lord had, however, "a few things" to allege against the church of Pergamos: because they had permitted in their communion, or otherwise connived at, some of those licentious teachers, against whom his apostles had protested: even such as "held the doctrine of Balaam." For that wicked man, though really favoured with prophetic visions, had yet, "for filthy lucre's sake," plotted mischief against Israel, by teaching Balak to seduce them into idolatry and fornication; and thus to throw in their way an occasion of falling into sin, and under the wrath of God. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:15,16. Jude 11—13.) In like manner, the church at Pergamos contained persons, who held "the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes," which thing (that is, the doctrine, and all which was connected with it) Christ hated. Hence it is evident, that the teachers of this sect sought "the wages of unrighteousness," by endeavouring to corrupt and pervert professed Christians; and that, in order to obtain them, they laid "stumblingblocks" in their way: and, on some pretence or other, encouraged and enticed them to join in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbours; and on those occasions, and at other times, to commit fornication. (Notes, Num. 25: 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 10:23—28.) They might, perhaps, inculcate the lawfulness of dissembling their religion to escape persecution,

17 He [n]that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give [o]to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone [p]a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it. [Practical Observations.]

18 And [q]unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write; These things saith, [r]the Son of God, [s]who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass;

19 I [t]know thy works, [u]and charity, and service, and faith, and thy [x]patience, and thy works; and [y]the last to be more than the first:

20 Notwithstanding, [z]I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest [a]that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach [b]and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols.

21 And I gave her [c]space to repent of her fornication, and she repented not.

22 Behold, I will cast her into a bed, [d]and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, [e]except they repent of their deeds.

23 And I will kill her children [f]with death; [g]and all the churches shall know that [h]I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: [i]and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.

which is an occasion of falling to numbers in circumstances which expose men to it: and joining in the idolatry and excess of the heathen worship would effectually answer this end. They, however, certainly grafted this prevarication on more general principles; and an erroneous and perverted view of the evangelical doctrine of "salvation by grace," and concerning Christian liberty, constituted "the root of bitterness," from which their evil practices naturally grew. "They turned the grace of God into lasciviousness," and taught others to do the same, and were the Antinomians of the primitive church; a heresy, which, in one form or other, has always hitherto sprung up, when the true gospel of Christ has been successfully preached; being a kind of tare, which the enemy will at all times sow among the good seed, as far as he is permitted.—Many have supposed, that this sect derived its name from Nicholas; one of the primitive deacons: and such a tradition prevailed early in the church. Yet the name was then so common, and might be given to the sect on so many other accounts, that there is no certainty in it. We read nothing of Nicholas in Scripture, to warrant so unfavourable an opinion of him: neither Peter nor Jude, who opposed heretics of the same stamp, called them by this name; and it may thence, almost with certainty, be concluded, that it was afterwards given them. Some have noted that Nicolaus, in Greek, signifies the same as Balaam does in Hebrew, namely, 'the conqueror of the people;' and have thence inferred, that they were so called from the influence which they obtained over men's minds, and the fatal use which they made of it, as Balaam had done before them.—The Lord, however, commanded the church of Pergamos to repent, and forsake these corrupt practices and principles; to exclude such scandalous and pernicious persons from their communion; and by every means to show a decided abhorrence of their tenets: otherwise, he would quickly visit them in judgment, and fight against the deceivers, and all who countenanced them, "with the sword of his mouth;" inflicting the threatened vengeance on them: nay, he would even deprive the church of their abused privileges.—This city is at present in a very ruinous condition; very few professed Christians are found in it, and they are wholly dependent on the church at Smyrna; being in a most abject state, and having scarcely any thing of our holy religion, except the empty name.

V. 17. What the Spirit spake by John, to the church at Pergamos, was meant for the instruction of all who should ever hear or read it: for whilst judgments impended over the head of the impenitent, blessings were prepared for those who overcame the multiplied temptations to which they were exposed. To each person, who thus adhered to the truth and precepts of Christ, he promised to give "the hidden manna;" or those invigorating and satisfying consolations, which spring from the lively exercise of faith in a crucified Saviour; a steadfast contemplation of the glory of God in him; and communion with the Father and the Son, by the influences of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Ex. 16: John 6:47—58.) This manna is hidden from carnal men; who see neither the source, the nature, the communication, nor the excellency of it: it is placed out of the reach of every enemy; nor can the supplies of it be intercepted: so that it is "the secret of the LORD, which is with them that fear him."—The gracious Saviour also promised to give to every conqueror, in this holy war, "a white stone." In ancient times, when any person among the Greeks, accused of crimes against the state, was tried by the suffrages of the citizens; they balloted for his acquittal by a white stone, and for his condemnation by a black one: so that Christ, the sole Judge of his people, in promising to give the victors "a white stone," assured them of their full justification at the great day of account; and of the present comfortable sense, that they were pardoned and accepted in him. The name written upon it is probably that of, "children of God;" and it represents the inseparable connexion of adoption into his family with forgiveness of sins. This name would be, as it were, inscribed upon the pardon given them, and made legible to the soul by "the Spirit of adoption." (Note, Rom. 8:14—17.) But "no man knoweth it, saving he that receiveth it;" for the ground of this knowledge is laid in his inward consciousness and experience; it is communicated to the lively Christian by "a witness in himself;" the world knoweth not the children of God; (Notes, 1 John 3:1—3. 5:9, 10.) and even their brethren cannot exactly distinguish them, so that sometimes they suspect or condemn the upright, and think well of specious hypocrites. But when the Holy Spirit illuminates his own work in the believer's soul, this "new name," and its real import, become legible and intelligible to him, and he knows himself to be a child and heir of God.—The expression may also signify, that the felicity which awaits the children of God, when they shall have obtained a complete victory over all their enemies, can never be understood, but by the enjoyment of it: yet, I apprehend, that present consolations, as the gracious recompense of victory over particular urgent temptations, were principally, though not exclusively intended.

V. 18, 19. Thyatira lay to the southeast of Pergamos; and the epistle to the church established in that city, was sent in the name of the "Son of God, who hath his eyes as a flame of fire;" which represented his authority and omniscience, and the steadfastness and righteousness of his appointments and decisions. "The Son of God" here reminded the pastors, and Christians at Thyatira also, that he knew their works, and observed with approbation their love of him, and of the brethren, and their general benevolence; their diligent attention to the various duties, by which they were called to serve him and each other, in the church and the community; their bold and steadfast profession of his doctrine, in genuine faith; the patience, with which they perseveringly endured afflictions and persecutions; and especially that their last works were more abundant than those which they had at first performed. (Notes, 2—5. 2 Thes. 1:3,4.)—Son of God, &c. (18) Compare 1:13,14.

V. 20—23. Thus far the church at Thyatira seemed in a flourishing condition: yet there was a worm at the root of its prosperity, which would destroy the whole, unless it were removed. Notwithstanding all those things which deserved commendation, the Lord Jesus had "a few things" to allege against the presiding minister and the pastors at Thyatira, especially because they suffered such persons as taught those abominable tenets, and perpetrated those evils which Christ hated: for the same heresy is here doubtless opposed, as in the foregoing epistle. It is not agreed, whether the expression, "that woman Jezebel," is to be understood literally, or figuratively. From the reading in some manuscripts it has been thought, that the wife of the presiding minister was intended; that she had obtained great influence in the affairs of the church, and made a bad use of it; that she pretended to prophetic gifts, and under that sanction propagated abominable principles; and though her conduct was disapproved by many, yet no proper decision was used in censuring her, or preventing the mischiefs which she occasioned.—The figurative meaning, however, seems more suited to the style and manner of this book: and in this sense, we may understand it to denote a company of persons, of the spirit and character of Jezebel, within the church, under one principal deceiver; as the Roman antichrist is represented by the emblem of an abandoned harlot. (Notes, 17:1—5.) Jezebel, a Zidonian, and a zealous idolater, being married to the king of Israel, contrary to the divine law, used all her influence to seduce the Israelites from the worship of JEHOVAH into idolatry, with which the vilest licentiousness was connected; and this greatly aided the temptation. (Marg. Ref. a.) Thus these persons at Thyatira, having, through the fault of the pastors and members of the church, found admission among them, and by their artifices and blandishments attached a party to their cause, employed their whole influence to draw men from the pure religion of Christ, into carnal and spiritual fornication and adultery, and to poison their minds with abominable doctrines. Yet they had not been duly censured and opposed: and it is evident, that neither the fatal tendency of their opinions, nor the atrociousness of their conduct, had been fully noticed and understood, till this epistle was sent. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:) This evil had long been working: and the Lord had, in his longsuffering, "given space for repentance" to the ringleader, and those who abetted the delusion; but they still persisted in their wickedness. He therefore declared that he would cast the principal offender "into a bed," as visited with some painful and incurable disease, at length to terminate in death; whilst such as had been seduced to join in these abominations, would, "unless they repented of their deeds," be thrown into the most grievous afflictions. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) Indeed Christ, their Lord and Judge, purposed to destroy by pestilence, or other tremendous judgments, these seducers, and their whole progeny, or party; in order, that "all the churches" might be assured, by the detection and exemplary punishment of such scandalous offenders, that he was that glorious God, who claimed it as his peculiar prerogative "to search the reins and hearts" of men; to discern all their secret imaginations, purposes, and inclinations; and to render to every one of them according to his works.—Here again the peculiar style of Deity is employed by "the Son of God." It is far more expressive to say, "I am he, who searcheth the heart" than "I search:" nor can such language be accounted for, on any other ground than the trinitarian doctrine, whatever pains and ingenuity may be employed in the attempt. (Marg. Ref. Note, Jer. 17:9,10.)

V. 24—28. To those who repented, and separated from the evils before mentioned; and to the rest, who had never received that doctrine, and had no acquaintance with those "depths," as they called them; perhaps avowing that they were peculiarly "the deep things of God," but which Christ declared to be "the depths of Satan," the most sagacious and covert devices of that enemy, to dishonour Christ and destroy men's souls;—to such as had kept clear, or had got free, from these "mysteries of iniquity," he would give no other command or injunction, than what they had already received from his ministers. (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.) But he exhorted them to hold fast those truths and precepts, till he came to remove them by death, or to judge the world. He also promised to every man, who overcame these too generally successful temptations, and kept his words in "the obedience of faith;" that he would grant him the privilege of sharing his victories, and the authority connected with them, as far as this could add to his true honour or felicity: so that he should be partaker of the honour, joy, and triumph, which would arise to the Redeemer, when all the nations of his enemies shall be dashed in pieces, as the potter's fragile vessel by the blow of an iron rod. (Notes, 16: 18: 19: Ps. 2:7—9. 149: Is. 34: 63:1—6. Ez. 38: 39:) He will also be an assessor of Christ in judgment, and concur in the sentence denounced on the nations of the ungodly. (Notes, 3:20—22. 1 Cor. 6:1—6.) Thus the victorious believer will receive from Christ, "glory, honour, immortality," and an immoveable kingdom; even as He has "received of the Father." (Note, Matt. 28:18.)—Moreover, he promised to give him "the morning-star:" which may either mean the earnests of the Spirit, as introductory to the felicity of heaven, as the morning-star to the rising of the sun; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:19—21.) or the ineffable glory, with which he will invest his victorious disciples, in the presence and enjoyment of him their Lord and Saviour, and in conformity to his glory. (Note, 22:16,17.)

V. 29. This concerned all other professed Christians, as much as those to whom it was immediately written. (Marg. Ref.)—This church is at present wholly extinct, and the city is in a very desolate condition.—Each epistle begins with "These things saith the Son of God, &c." and each ends with the call; "Let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches."—What "Christ saith," that "the Spirit saith:" the same individual words and works are ascribed to each; as in many instances to the Father and to the Son. "For the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" are three; and "these three are one."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1. The Lord Jesus alone can uphold and prosper his ministers, their light is wholly derived from him and maintained by him; he supports them by his powerful right hand, and disposes of them in his sovereign wisdom. It therefore behooves all those, who are favoured with able and faithful teachers, to be thankful for them, to walk in the light thus vouchsafed them, and to be careful that they do not provoke the Lord to remove it. And all, who sustain that important and arduous office, should remember their dependence on Christ, and their accountableness to him; and "take heed to themselves, and to their doctrine," "and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost has made them overseers; to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." (Notes, Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 4:11—16.)—In all these respects, the presiding ministers, whether called Bishops, or by some other name, should remember, that the largest proportion of responsibility attaches to them; their conduct is more extensively beneficial, or the contrary, than that of inferior pastors; and their judgment will be proportionably useful, if they neglect their duty, connive at iniquity and false doctrine; or mislead their inferiors by heretical instruction, or a worldly example. If they have "the rejoicing in the testimony of their own consciences;" to their simplicity and godly sincerity in this sacred service; the impartial retrospect may give them confidence, that he will make their cause his own.—The manifold evils, which abound in every part of the church, in a very great degree, arise from the misconduct and negligence of its rulers and pastors, who ought especially to weigh with great seriousness, and much self-examination, as in the prospect of the last decisive day, the import of these epistles of Christ; and frequently they will find cause to apply to themselves a great part of the reproof and warning which they contain.—Our Lord is "like a man who is gone into a far country, having given to every servant his work:" but faith realizes him, as "walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks," both in respect of his omnipotent Deity, and his omnipresent and all-pervading Spirit. He observes the conduct of those who have the light of his word and ordinances, and maintains that light, so long as a good use is made of it: but he will not fail to rebuke and correct those who walk inconsistently; and he continues his golden candlestick in one place, and removes it from another, as he sees good; for all second causes are wholly subservient to his all-disposing sovereign will, but he orders the whole in perfect wisdom, equity and truth.

V. 2—7. Our gracious Lord "seeth in secret," and is not backward to commend "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope" of his servants. (Notes, Matt. 6:1—4. 1 Cor. 4:1—5.) He marks and approves their abhorrence of that which is evil, and their separation from the company, and protestation against the misconduct, of those who profess the gospel, but disgrace it by their crimes. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5: 2 Thes. 3:6—9,14,15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.) Nor does he less approve their conduct, in examining the pretensions of those who speak in his name, or claim attention, as immediately inspired by him; that they may detect and condemn those as "liars," who contradict the doctrine of his holy word. He also kindly notices the trials and hardships, which his people bear, and the patience with which they endure them; and "how for his name's sake they labour, and have not fainted." Thus he sets ministers, parents, masters, and seniors, an example of commending what is right in those placed under their care; and of thus introducing needful reproof. But he will by no means connive at what is evil, in any kind or degree. Even when believers and churches steadily profess his truth, attend on his ordinances, and outwardly obey his precepts; yet he "hath somewhat against them," if they decline from the fervour of their "first love:" nay, he not only reproves them for these abatements in affection and zeal; but threatens, that unless they "remember whence they are fallen, and repent, and do their first works, he will quickly remove their candlestick out of his place." The present state of Christianity, in the cities mentioned in these epistles, is an alarming instance of the divine truth and justice in this respect; and in every age he calls on all who have eyes to see, and "ears to hear," to observe the truth of what "the Spirit said unto the churches."—The state of religion in most places where a reformation from popery took place, and with several descriptions of Christians among us, where once spiritual religion shone most illustriously, manifestly prove, that he still removes the candlestick from those "who forsake their first love," and do not repent at his call; even though they hate and strongly protest against "the deeds of Nicolaitanes" and antinomians, "which he hateth." This should teach those, who now have the light, to "be zealous and repent;" lest they too should be left in the dark.

CHAPTER III.

The epistle of Christ to the angel of the church of Sardis; consisting of reproofs, exhortations, warnings, and promises to the pious remnant, 1—6. That to the angel of the church in Philadelphia, replete with encouragement, 7—13. That to Laodicea; comprising severe rebukes of lukewarmness and spiritual pride; connected with instruction, counsels, calls to repentance, invitations, and promises, 14—22.

AND [a]unto the angel of the church in Sardis write; These things saith [b]he that hath the seven Spirits of God, [c]and the seven stars; [d]I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, [e]and art dead.

2 Be [f]watchful, and [g]strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found [h]thy works perfect before God.

And surely this single mention in Scripture of Christians "forsaking their first love," when the context and consequences are well considered, most awfully reproves those numbers who speak of this as a common case; who excuse lukewarmness and sloth, in themselves and others, as a thing of course, by words to this effect; (Note, 3:14—16.) and who, speaking of Christians as "in their first love," mean that this is a low attainment, and that they will, as a thing of course, grow "less fervent in spirit, in serving the Lord," as they get above the infancy of Christianity! When the majority in any church adopt such notions, and accustom themselves and each other to such expressions, it is a certain sign, that they will speedily provoke Christ to "remove their candlestick, unless they repent:" nay, it is the natural language of stony-ground hearers, whose joy and affection have subsided, and who, "having no root in themselves," are gradually withering away. (Note, Matt. 13:20—22. P. O. 18—23.) For, though the aged flourishing Christian may feel less vigour of affection, than he did at some times, soon after his conversion, in which novelty and self-love had no small share; yet there is far more constancy and energy in his love, influencing him to habitual self-denying obedience, and exertion in the cause of God, apart from all selfish motives, than there was before. The former resembles the transient noisy flame of thorns; the latter is like the constant, vehement, penetrating, and efficacious heat of a fire made by substantial fuel.—But in the midst of all the stratagems and open assaults of the enemy, which the traitor in the camp so often renders successful; there are some, who through faith obtain the victory; and to them Christ still "gives to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

V. 8—17. As "the First and the Last, who was dead and is alive," is the believer's Brother and Friend; he must be rich in the deepest poverty, honourable amidst the lowest abasement, and happy under the heaviest tribulations. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 15:12—16.) Indeed the disciples can reasonably expect no other, than to be reviled by those who blaspheme their divine Lord, and "say that they are Christians, but are not;" and whom Christ will one day show to have been "the synagogue of Satan;" being combined together by every means to oppose his truth, and vilify and injure his faithful servants. The devil may also prevail to cast true Christians and zealous ministers into prison, or otherwise to try them, and they "may have tribulation many days:" but with such a Friend and Comforter, as "the Son of God," they ought not to "fear any of those things which they may suffer:" their trials will be only for a limited season, and for gracious purposes; they will not be "hurt by the second death," for their enemies can only kill their bodies; and if they are enabled to be "faithful till death," the Captain of their salvation, who conquered by dying, will give them a crown of eternal life. (Notes, Matt. 10:27,28. Rom. 8:32—39. 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) The Christian, who thus holds fast the Lord's name, and denies not his truth, in those places where Satan peculiarly erects his throne, and at those times when his faithful witnesses are liable to be martyred in his cause, needs not fear his "sharp sword with two edges;" any more than the beloved wife need be alarmed at a sword in the hand of her affectionate husband, who yet would tremble and faint to see it in the hand of an assassin. But this confidence cannot be supported, without steady obedience: for the Lord not only hates the principles and conduct of those who indulge avarice or sensuality, under the pretence of abounding grace and Christian liberty, and seduce others into the same abominations; but he will come quickly, and "fight with the sword of his mouth against" those bishops, pastors, and churches, who countenance them; unless they repent of their connexion with the most abhorred of his enemies, and the sanction which they give them.

V. 18—29. Even when the Lord knows the works of his people to be wrought in love, zeal, faith, and patience, and "the last to be more than the first;" if his "eyes, which are as a flame of fire," observe that they allow among them such as teach licentiousness, and seduce his servants to commit wickedness, or to turn aside to any false worship, he will rebuke, correct, or punish them, without respect of persons, men or women, high or low, whatever influence they may possess, or however they may be gifted or distinguished. He gives them indeed "space to repent;" (Notes, Rom. 2:4—6. 2 Pet. 3:9,14—16.) but if they do not avail themselves of his longsuffering, he will surely "cast them into great tribulation:" and frequently, the remarkable sufferings, with the discoveries of the secret wickedness of the actors in such corruptions of the gospel, even in this world, show the churches, that Christ is "He, who searcheth the reins and hearts," and establishes his counsels in wisdom and justice. This at least will be evident to the whole assembled world, when he shall come to judgment, to give unto every one of us "according to our works." Let us then avoid and protest against such perversions of Christianity; and beware of these "depths of Satan," of which they who know the least are the most happy. Let us remember, that the yoke of Christ "is easy, and his burden light;" that he lays nothing on his servants, but what is for their good, and authorizes none to add to it; and that he calls upon us "to hold fast what we have received until he come." (Notes, Matt. 23:1—4. Acts 15:7—11,22—29. Gal. 5:1—6.) When we are tempted to sin, let us recollect what consolations he has promised to the victorious combatant: and, looking to him for help, let us aspire to "the hidden manna," "the joy that a stranger intermeddleth not with," the assurance of acceptance, the Spirit of adoption, and the earnest of eternal glory. And after every victory, may we follow up our advantage against the enemy, that we may "overcome, and keep the works" of Christ "unto the end;" and at last have glory, honour, and felicity, beyond all our present conceptions. This should often be thought of, under the animating idea of receiving power and authority from the Son of God, according to what "he hath received from the Father," as the fruit of his conflicts and victories; being made partakers of his felicity, abiding for ever in his presence, and having him for our everlasting Light and Glory. (Note, 21:22—27.) Let then every one, who has an ear, attend to "what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—3. Sardis lay to the south of Thyatira, and was once the renowned capital of Lydia, the kingdom of Crœsus.—The epistle to the presiding pastor, and to the church, in this city, was sent as a message from him "that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars." (Notes, 1:4—6,12—20. 2:1.) That is, it came from the Divine Saviour, through whom the Holy Spirit, in the variety and abundance of his precious gifts and graces, was communicated to all the churches, and to the seven here mentioned in particular; and who was their sovereign Proprietor and Ruler. This reminded the persons addressed, from whom they must seek wisdom, strength, and grace, for those things to which he called them; and it implied a command to the ministers to "take heed to themselves and to their doctrine," and to be active and zealous in promoting a revival in the church; especially to "the angel," the bishop, or presiding minister, who, it is probable, had by his misconduct, his bad example, or want of vigilance and activity, greatly contributed to reduce the church to a very declined and withering condition. For the divine Saviour "knew their works" not to be such as he could approve. (Note, 2:2—5.) They had indeed "a name to live:" they professed the truth, and had not deviated into heresy; they possessed gifts, and had the ordinances of God regularly administered among them; and they were considered, by others, and by themselves, as vitally united to Christ, perhaps in a flourishing state: but he knew, "that they were dead." Numbers were wholly hypocrites, and "dead in sin;" others were in a very torpid, disordered, and lifeless state; and the church in general was rather a dead corpse, or a statue resembling a Christian congregation, than a company of living members of Christ's mystical body. The Lord therefore called on them, the bishop and pastors especially, to awake, and look about them; to be vigilant in guarding against the stratagems and assaults of their enemies; to be active and earnest in the duties of their several stations; and to examine carefully into the state of their souls, and into that of the church: that so they might use proper means of "strengthening the things that remained, and were ready to die;" and endeavour, in dependence on the grace of the Holy Spirit, to revive and invigorate the faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections of those who were alive to God, though in a declining state; to bring formalists to repentance and conversion: and to purge out such as were scandalous, and infectious to others. In this manner the lamp, which was ready to expire, might be made again to burn more bright; and the state of the church, which seemed like a dying man, might revive and be restored to spiritual health and vigour. For their heart-searching Lord had "not found their works perfect, or complete, before God." They were radically defective: most of them were formal and hypocritical; and the rest languid, partial, and corrupted by sinister motives and purposes. He could not, therefore, commend them, as he had done the more hearty and complete obedience and services of flourishing Christians: because they were not such before God, whatever they might appear to be in the sight of men. He therefore called on them to "remember" the favour and heard, [k]and hold fast, and [l]repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, [m]I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not [n]know what hour I will come upon thee.

4 Thou hast a few [o]names [p]even in Sardis [q]which have not defiled their garments; and they shall [r]walk with me in white: [s]for they are worthy.

5 He [t]that overcometh, [u]the same shall be clothed in white raiment; [x]and I will not blot out his name out of [y]the book of life, but I will [z]confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 He [a]that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

[Practical Observations.]

7 And [b]to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith [c]he that is holy, [d]he that is true, he that hath [e]the key of David [f]he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth:

8 [g]I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee [h]an open door, and no man can shut it: [i]for thou hast [j]a little strength, [k]and hast kept my word, [l]and hast not denied my name.

9 Behold, I will make them of [m]the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, [n]I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

10 Because thou hast kept [o]the word of my patience, [p]I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon [q]all the world, [r]to try them that dwell upon the earth.

11 Behold, [s]I come quickly: [t]hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take [u]thy crown.

which they had received; the advantages for religious improvement which they possessed; and the truths, precepts, and exhortations which they had heard; that they might "hold fast" pure and undefiled religion, and repent of their inconsistent and negligent conduct. But if, after this warning, they did not become more vigilant, sober, zealous, and diligent; he assured them, that he would come, with some unexpected, surprising, and terrible judgments, without any further intimation of his purpose, till they were suddenly overwhelmed by it.—He that hath the seven spirits of God. (1) This accords with the several texts, in which our Lord promises to send the Holy Spirit to his disciples: but who is he that has the Spirit of God and sends him to men, even as he himself was sent by the Father?—Art dead.] Notes, Luke 15:22—24. Eph. 2:1,2. 1 Tim. 5:5,6. Jam. 2:19—26.—A thief. (3) Notes, Matt. 24:42—44. 1 Thes. 5:1—3.

V. 4—6. Even at Sardis there were a few Christians, whose names would be at length mentioned with distinguished honour, on account of their holy singularity: as they had not "defiled their garments," or disgraced their profession by the worldly lusts and sinful practices, to which the rest were addicted. And Christ assured them that they "should walk with him in white," the emblem of perfect purity, triumph, and joy; and so be his accepted, holy, and honoured companions, in heavenly felicity. (Notes, 6:9—11. 7:9—17. 19: 7,8,11—16. Esth. 8:15. Ec. 9:7—9.)—"For they were worthy," or meet and proper persons, to be admitted to that glorious and happy state, having approved themselves to be his faithful friends and servants, whilst they lived on earth. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) In short, to every conqueror in the spiritual warfare, at a place especially where temptations and bad examples so much abounded, the Lord promised, "that he should be clothed in white raiment," as completely and eternally justified, sanctified, and made glorious in the presence and favour of God. (Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) Neither would "he blot the name" of any such person "out of the book of life," in which his chosen and accepted servants are registered; even, though the corrupt church to which he belonged should be given up; though numbers of those, who had "a name to live," and were deemed heirs of heaven, were left to apostatize, or to be rejected as hypocrites; and though the Christian himself might often have fears of this kind amidst his conflicts and temptations. On the contrary, Christ would surely confess his name, as one of his friends and brethren, at the last day, before his eternal Father and all his holy angels. (Notes, Matt. 10:32,33. 25:34—40. Luke 12:8—10. John 6:36—40. 10:26—31.)—All this related to other bishops, pastors, and churches also, who were, or should hereafter be placed in similar circumstances.—This once flourishing city now lies in ruins: a few persons called Christians are found there; but they are reduced to the most abject slavery, and have neither church nor minister among them.—Book, &c. V. 7. Philadelphia lay to the southeast of Sardis.—The epistle to the angel of the church in that city, was sent in the name of "Him that is holy," and of "Him that is true," or of "the Holy One, and the True One:" which words contain a very conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ; for what mere creature can with propriety speak of himself in this language? Notes, 4:6—8. 6:9—11. 15:1—4 Is. 6:1—4. 30:8—14. 57: 15,16.) It was also sent in the name of him, "that hath the key of David." (1:18. Notes, 8,9. 5:1—10. Is. 22:20—25.) Being the promised Son of David, according to the flesh, and the King of the true Israel to all generations, he has the absolute power to open the gate of mercy to whom he pleases to open the kingdom of heaven to the souls of his people, when removed by death; and to open their graves, and bring forth their bodies glorious and immortal, that they may be reunited to their souls in everlasting felicity: and on the other hand to shut out, and exclude from mercy, and from heaven, whom he will, and to shut them up in hell; nor can any resistance be made to his power, or any appeal from his decision. He has likewise power to "open the understanding" and the heart, or judicially to close them; to "open a door," for the preaching of his gospel, or for the deliverance of his servants out of trouble: and when in these or any other instances he opens, no one, either man or angel, can shut; when he shuts, no creature can possibly open. (Notes, 8,9. 5:1—10. Job 11: 7—12. 12:13—25. 34:20—30. Matt. 16:19. Gal. 3:19—25.)

V. 8, 9. The holy, faithful, and sovereign Lord and Saviour above mentioned, "knew the works" of his presiding pastor, ministers, and disciples, at Philadelphia; and they were such as he graciously approved: they might, therefore, for their encouragement be assured, that by his gospel, and the means of grace afforded them, he had "set before them an open door" of access into the family and kingdom of God, and to all the present and everlasting privileges of his people, which no creature could shut against them; or, as some explain it, he had set before them an open door of usefulness, in spreading his gospel, nor could any one prevent the success of their "work and labour of love" for that purpose. (Note, 7.) For though this church seems not to have been so eminent as some others, for numbers, and gifts, and ability of every kind; yet they "had a little strength:" they were upright in their profession of the gospel; they had some vigour of faith and holy affection, and were zealously using their little influence to promote the success of Christianity. They had also "kept the word of Christ;" having adhered to his truths, commands, and institutions, in faith, obedience, and steadfastness; neither had they denied their relations and obligations to him, or acted to the dishonour of his name, notwithstanding fears and dangers. (Note, 2:10,11.) For they likewise were exposed to persecution, from some who professed to be the people of God; but whom Christ disowned, and declared to be "liars, and the synagogue of Satan:" and he promised that he would at length constrain these opposers to come and pay court to them, in the most submissive manner, prostrating themselves at their feet, and supplicating their favour, as convinced of his love to them. (Notes, Ex. 11:8. 12:29—36. Esth. 8:17. Is. 49:22,23. 60:10—14. Zech. 8:20—23.)—Perhaps the unexpected success of the gospel, in Philadelphia and the neighbourhood, rendered the Christians so powerful, that the Jews and their adherents were glad to seek their protection from the rage of the multitude, by which vast numbers of them were frequently massacred in those turbulent times. The language leads us also to conclude, that many were converted to Christianity by means of those events. Some indeed think that Judaizing Christians were meant; but it is far more natural to understand the word "Jews" in its ordinary sense; and to consider them as open opponents, rather than as false professors of the gospel.

V. 10, 11. As the bishop, pastors, and church at Philadelphia had kept the word of Christ in that constancy and patience which he had commanded and exemplified; (Notes, Heb. 12:2,3. 1 Pet. 4:1,2.) and had by his grace, been enabled to stand their ground, and to "deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow him:" he promised to keep them "from the hour of temptation." This relates to some remarkable season of persecution, heresy, or apostacy, which was about to come on all the churches in the world, especially through the whole Roman empire, to try and prove the sincerity and strength of their faith and love. On this trying occasion, the Lord Jesus would shelter the church at Philadelphia from the fury of the storm, and not let them be so sharply tried or tempted, as other churches were; which might, in some respects, have more strength, but had also more need of correction, and of being proved and purified. It is generally supposed to refer to Trajan's persecution, which was more general and violent than the persecutions under Nero and Domitian. But, as this city was the last of all the seven, which was taken by the Mohammedans; and as there has been a succession of Christians there, in every generation to this time; some have applied this to their preservation from that awful delusion, which almost extirpated Christianity in those regions.—It is indeed to be feared, that the professed Christians at Philadelphia, have at present but little of the power of godliness: yet we may hope, that Christ has had a few real disciples in every age, and has some even at present, in this city. —The Lord next called the attention of the persons concerned to the assurance, that he "was coming quickly," to try his professed people; to deliver such as were faithful; to destroy their enemies, or to judge the world. (Notes, 1:7. 22:6,7,18 —21. Heb. 10:35—39. Jam. 5:7—11.) He, therefore, commanded them "to hold fast" the truth which they had received, and to maintain the ground which they had got; that no one might, through their dread of trials and sufferings, deprive them of the victor's crown, for which they were contending; or take away that distinguished honour which this commendation conferred on them; for this could not be preserved without vigilance, diligence, and persevering courage. (Notes, 2:24—28. 2 John 7—11.)—'The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia was consummated,' [viz. by the Ottomans,] 'A. D. 1312; and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick of the Revelation: the desolation is complete; and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally elude the search of the curious traveller. The circus, and three stately theatres, of Laodicea, are now peopled with wolves and foxes; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village; the god of Mohammed, without a rival, ... is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamos; and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage.' (Such is the insidious language of this infidel writer, who sneers at the prophecy, while he records its accomplishment!) 'At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant sons defended their religion and freedom, above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies, and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect; a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same.' Gibbon.—Some readers may need to be informed, that Gibbon wrote a much admired history of 'the decline of the Roman empire,' in which he has, with great skill, infused an abundant proportion of infidelity and impiety, in a peculiarly plausible and imposing manner.

V. 12, 13. To animate the Christians at Philadelphia, and all others, to the spiritual conflict, our Lord next promised to make every conqueror "a pillar in the temple of his God;" to establish him as an ornamental, nay, essential part of the spiritual edifice, which he, as Mediator, was building to the glory of his God and Father: that, being consecrated to him, and placed in the sanctuary above, he might conduce to the beauty, proportion, and magnificence of the whole; and be for ever most honourable and blessed, as "an habitation of God through the Spirit;" without any fear of being separated from him, or deprived of his favour and presence for ever. (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) Upon this pillar he promised "to write the name of his God;" that all might know to whom it belonged, and to whose glory it was erected; according to the custom of inscribing, on stately columns, the name and exploits of the person, to whose memory they were dedicated. He would also write on it "the name of the city of his God;" (the God whom he, Christ, in human nature, worshipped and served: Note, John 20:11—17.) this is called the new Jerusalem; it is of heavenly original, and derives its glory from the presence of God in it. (Notes, 21: Gal. 4:21 —31.) Thus all would know to what city the Victor belonged, and that he was entitled to all its privileges for evermore. The Lord promised also to write upon him "his own new name;" even that of Emmanuel, Jesus, the Redeemer of sinners, which he has newly assumed in addition to his former titles, of Creator, Upholder, and Lord of all worlds. Thus he would own him as one of his chosen people; a trophy of his victory over the world, sin, Satan, and death; and a monument erected to the power of his arm, the truth of his word, the efficacy of his atonement and mediation, and the unsearchable riches of his grace. In these declarations, all bishops, pastors, and churches, yea, all professed Christians, in every age and nation, are interested, according to the difficulty and completeness of their victory.

V. 14—16. Laodicea lay to the south of Philadelphia, and in the road from that city to Ephesus; for the seven churches were situated in a kind of circle; and the progressive journey from one to another of them, in rotation, might be made in the order of these epistles.—A flourishing church had been planted at Laodicea, in the time of the apostle Paul: (Notes, Col. 2:1—4. 4:15,16.) but it had greatly declined before this epistle was sent thither. The Lord Jesus ordered it to be written in the name of "The AMEN;" of Him who is Truth, in himself, and who will surely confirm and ratify all his words, which are established, and unchangeable like his own nature. (Notes, Is. 65:16. 2 Cor. 1:17—20.) For he is "the faithful and true Witness," most exactly testifying the nature, truths, purposes, and will of God to man, and bearing witness most impartially for or against the conduct and characters of his professed servants, and of all his creatures. (Notes, 1:4 —6. Is. 55:4.) He sent to the Laodiceans also, under the title of "the Beginning of the creation of God," or the Origin, Author, and Ruler of the whole universe, who has authority and power to dispose of all things as he sees good. (Note, Col. 1:15—17.) This glorious Lord of all "knew their works" to be such, as were utterly unworthy of his approbation; for they were "neither cold nor hot;" they neither wholly cast off all regard to the gospel; nor yet were they zealous, fervent, and diligent in religion. He therefore declared that "he would they were cold or hot;" he desired, (speaking after the manner of men, expressing their utter dislike to any one's conduct,) that they would either renounce their profession, and cease from the worthless form of attending on his ordinances; or that they would show a becoming earnestness in those things, which pertained to his service and glory. For, while they were called by his name, and reluctantly performed a scanty measure of external duties, with an evident indifference and weariness in them; their evil tempers, unholy actions, and attachment to the world, and to its pleasures, company, and interests, dishonoured him more than their apostacy could do; and in the event, it would be equally fatal to their own souls. Because in this manner they would give numbers an unfavourable opinion of Christianity, as if it had been an unholy religion: while others would conclude that it could afford no real satisfaction; otherwise its professors would not have been so heartless in it, or so ready to seek pleasure or happiness from the world; or that it was not of much value, seeing they would not give up any thing of supposed value for the sake of it.—In short, professed Christians of this character are traitors in the camp, who are always more dangerous than open enemies; or wicked servants, who disgrace and rob their masters more than they can do after they quit, or are turned out of the family.—Unless, therefore, they became more "fervent in spirit, in serving the Lord;" he was determined to show his contempt and abhorrence of them, by rejecting them; even as a man, whose stomach nauseates water which is lukewarm, casts it out of his mouth with loathing and disgust. (Notes, Jer. 14:19—22. 15:1—4. Zech. 11:7—9.)

V. 17. While the state of the Laodicean church was so lamentably declined, that very few real Christians, and those of very small proficiency, remained in it: the spiritual pride and self-confidence of the presiding minister, the pastors and people, had proportionably increased! and this gave occasion to the following reproof, instruction, and counsel. They were ready to say within themselves to each other, and even in a boasting manner to their neighbours, that "they were rich" in spiritual gifts and attainments; that they were "increased in goods," and had obtained a larger measure of every spiritual gift and endowment, than they formerly had, even when the apostles were with them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:8—13. 5:1—5.) They thought, indeed, they had need of nothing; but were complete in knowledge, wisdom, goodness, strength, and establishment in the privileges and liberty of the gospel; like poor lunatics, who fancy every house and estate which they see or hear of to be their own. Thus they preferred themselves to others; and, being proud in spirit, instead of "poor in spirit," they could only pray in the Pharisee's manner; (Note, Luke 18:9—14.) and were utterly incapable of the life of faith in Christ for all things pertaining to salvation. For they "knew not that they were wretched and miserable," in a most abject, perilous, and perishing condition, and utterly destitute of wisdom and grace: not only poor, as all natural men are, but poor as professors of the gospel; being Pharisees upon evangelical principles; and proud of their attainments in Christianity, when in fact most of them were wholly unconverted. This delusion took place because they were "blind;" they had only that "knowledge which puffeth up;" but they had never seen the real glory of God in Christ, the evil of sin, their own exceeding sinfulness, the deceitfulness of their hearts, or the excellency of the gospel. (Notes, John 9:39—41. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 2 Pet. 1:8,9.) They therefore continued "naked," though they knew it not; being neither covered with the justifying righteousness of Christ, nor adorned by his grace.—The original is peculiarly emphatical: for the article is prefixed to the first epithet, so that the passage may be thus rendered, "Thou art the wretched one, the miserable one, &c." and thus alone were they distinguished from all the other churches.

V. 18, 19. The case described in the preceding verse was that of the church in general, and of its bishop, pastors, and members in particular, by the testimony even of "the Searcher of all hearts;" yet he counselled them "to buy of him" those things of which they were in such urgent need. They could have them from no other in the world; and he sold them to the poorest, who applied for them, "without money and without price." (Note, Is. 55:1—3.) Even such wretched and indigent sinners as they were might obtain these invaluable blessings; yet much of what they valued, though worthless in itself, must be renounced in order to appropriate them, and hence it might properly be called "buying" them. (Notes, Matt. 13:44—46. Phil. 3:8—11.) They were therefore "counselled" (and the counsels of Christ are commands, invitations, and promises,) to apply to him for "gold tried in the fire, that they might be rich." This denotes that true and precious faith and grace, which in numberless instances has endured the hottest fire of persecution without being consumed, and has been rendered more resplendent by the flames; and which proves most advantageous in affliction, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. This would make them "rich" in reality, as it would ensure and evidence their interest in "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and in all the promises given through him to his people. (Notes, Eph. 3:8. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) He advised them also to buy of him "white raiment, that they might be clothed, and that the shame of their nakedness might not appear:" for as "their own righteousnesses were as filthy rags," and their profession of Christianity hypocritical; so they must soon be exposed and put to shame before men and angels, unless they had his righteousness put on them, for "a robe of salvation," and were made holy by his sanctifying Spirit. (Notes, 4—6. 16:12—16. Gen. 2:25. 3:7—11. Hos. 2:2—5.) But as their pride and self-confidence had blinded them to the truth of their case and character, and consequently to the value of these blessings; so Christ directed them to "anoint their eyes with eye-salve, that they might see:" let them examine themselves by the rule of his word, and pray earnestly for the teaching of his Holy Spirit, to purge away their pride, prejudices, and worldly lusts; that they might learn their own real character and situation, and the nature and preciousness of his salvation, and value it in a more suitable manner. (Notes, 17. John 16:8—11,14,15. Rom. 11:16—21.)—These warnings and exhortations were not given them in indignation, but in mercy; for it was the general rule of his conduct to "rebuke and chasten those whom he loved:" (Notes, Heb. 12:4—11.) and they might consider these rebukes as tokens of his favour: for such they would prove if properly attended to. It behooved them, therefore, to be very zealous and earnest in these most important concerns; especially in repenting, renouncing, cleansing away, and seeking forgiveness of the evils into which they had fallen. (Note, 2:2—5.)

Tried in the fire. (18) Πεπυρωμενον. 1:15. Eph. 6:16. 2 Pet. 3:12. Zech. 13:9. Sept. Having been fired, or tried in the fire. Πυρωσις, 1 Pet. 4:12.—Eye-salve.] Κολλουριον. The derivation is uncertain, but the meaning undisputed. (Notes, 1 John 2:20—29.)

V. 20—22. To encourage the repentance, and excite the earnestness, of the lukewarm Laodiceans, the Lord called on them to notice, with admiration, his condescension, patience, and grace; that, while they were so wanting in love to him, he stood waiting "at the door," and seeking to be readmitted into the church, and into their hearts, from whence their sins had driven him. He stood without, "knocking," by the dispensations of his providence, the warnings and instructions of his word, and the convincing influences of his Spirit; and thus requiring them to receive and entertain him. (Notes, Cant. 5:2—8.) Nay, though the church should not admit him; yet, if any individual among them was willing to "open," and give up his heart and affections to him, in order that he might destroy his enemies and rivals, cast out idols, subdue all iniquities, and "make all things new;" he would certainly "enter in," and take such delight in the work of his grace, and communicate such blessings and consolations to the soul of that man, that it might be said "he supped with him, and he with him;" such intimate communion should be thenceforth maintained between redeemed sinners and their most gracious Saviour (Notes, 5:1. Cant. 6:1—3. Matt. 26:29. Luke 12:35—46. 22:24—30.)—He graciously condescends to "sup with them' now, and he will take them to "sup with him" hereafter, and that for ever. (Note, 19:9,10.)—In short, to every conqueror over such strong temptations as the Laodiceans were exposed to, the Lord promised a blessing proportioned to the difficulty of the conflict: for he engaged to "grant him to sit with him in his throne;" and by an inconceivable union and fellowship with him in all his glory, and an interest in all the benefits of his mediatorial authority and power, to possess an honour and felicity which can never be explained or conceived, except by those who experience it. For as these victors would be first conformed to Christ in conflict, self-denial, and suffering, so would they at last be conformed to him in victory and exaltation; being "seated with him in his throne," even "as he overcame and was set down with his father in his throne." The same inexpressible dignity would also be bestowed on other conquerors in like difficult circumstances, for the warnings and instructions were intended for the benefit of all who heard them, in every age and nation.—The ruins of this city show that it once was most magnificent: but at present no human creature dwells there. So that the state of these seven cities, both respecting Christianity and their outward prosperity, exactly accords to the commendation or rebuke, which were given to the churches established there, by the Spirit of prophecy, above seventeen hundred years ago! which remarkable coincidence contains an instructive lesson, and a solemn warning to all other cities and nations favoured with the gospel, and to their rulers, ecclesiastical and civil, not to neglect or trifle with so great a blessing.—Nothing, in these short epistles, is said concerning distinct congregations in any of the cities mentioned: though some time before there were several elders (πρεσβυτεροι, or επισκοποι) at Ephesus: on the other hand, nothing is introduced respecting any dependent churches in the neighbouring towns, or villages, as under the authority of the angel, or presiding minister, in each of these churches. Hence it appears that men of discordant sentiments, on the subject of ecclesiastical government, in vain attempt to support their several systems, in every part, by this portion of Scripture.

I stand, &c. (20) Ἑστηκα ... και κρουω. "I have stood, ... and do knock." 'I have been standing without for a long time; and yet I continue to knock for admission, though hitherto neglected.'

CHAPTER IV.

John, in vision, beholds heaven opened, and the glory of God, as seated on an exalted throne, 1—3; surrounded by twenty-four elders, and four living creatures, who unite in adoring Him, as the Creator and Lord of all, 4—11.

[a] AFTER this I looked, and behold, [b]a door was opened in heaven: and [c]the first voice which I heard, was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, [d]Come up thither, [e]and I will show thee things which must be hereafter.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. When he, who has "the fulness of the Spirit," and who rules over all means and instruments, reproves, counsels, or commands; his words imply the promise of all needful assistance, to those who obediently attend to them. But how many professed Christians does that heart-searching Judge, who "knoweth our works," behold, "who have a name that they live," and perhaps much celebrity in the church, and "yet are dead in trespasses and sins!" Alas! it is to be feared, that in some cases both national establishments, regularly constituted, with rulers and teachers; but many more select religious societies, who have exact forms and notions, and who profess the truths of the gospel with some reputation, consist almost entirely of such persons, and have very little vital godliness among them. We should, therefore, be very diligent and impartial in examining ourselves by the rules of Scripture; very earnest in prayer to the Lord to show us what we are, and very careful not to rest satisfied with the opinion of men, even of the wisest and most discerning of the human race, respecting us.—When it is evident, that we, or the society to which we belong, have declined, in respect to vital godliness; we should spare no pains, and neglect no means, which may "strengthen the things that remain, and are ready to die;" for the heart-searching Saviour often judges those works, not to be sound and upright before God, which men admire and applaud: and and our great concern is with our Judge, not with our fellow-subjects, or fellow-criminals.—In seeking a revival, in our own souls, or in those of others, it is incumbent on us, "to remember what we have received and heard;" that, by comparing our advantages and profession which our proficiency, we may be humbled and quickened; and so excited "to hold fast" what we retain, and to "repent and do our first works."—But if men will despise warnings to "watch and pray;" Christ will surely come, when they do not expect him, and appoint such slothful servants their portion among his enemies.—Yet, even in very corrupt churches, he has commonly "a few names, who have not defiled their garments:" and if our lot be cast in such a situation, we should be ambitious of this true honour; that, amidst numerous bad examples, and strong temptations, we may be found "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." At present we may indeed be hated, or derided, for this holy singularity of conduct; but the Lord will admit us to the honour of "walking with him in white," as graciously accounted worthy of so great a felicity; when all unbelievers and formal professors shall have their portion in the blackness of eternal darkness. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:17. Jude 11—13.) For, whether few or many overcome the peculiar temptations of their situation, they, and they only, will be accepted and triumphant at the last: not one of them shall have his "name blotted out of the book of life;" nor will the divine Saviour refuse to confess the meanest of their names, "before his Father and all his holy angels."

V. 7—13. It is incumbent on us to attend to him, "who is Holy and True," who hates sin, yet performs his largest promises to believing sinners: he reigns on the throne of David; he "opens" the gates of life and death, of heaven and hell, and none can shut them; "he shutteth and none can open." Whether, therefore, "he set before us an open door" of access to his mercy-seat, or afford us an opportunity of usefulness; no created being can shut us out from it. Even if we have but "little strength," yet if we have "kept his word, and have not denied him," amidst fears and discouragements; he will not let any enemy prevail against us: and as he has all hearts in his hands, so he often disposes the opposers of his people to show them respect, to desire their friendship, to own that he has loved them, or gladly to receive the truth from them. (Note, Gen. 50:15—20.)—If we would escape those severe corrections and violent temptations, which, from time to time, are permitted to try the churches throughout the earth; we must patiently adhere to the truth and will of Christ; and shrink from no cross, with which we meet, when following his example: for an unwatchful conduct makes way for temptation, and unfits men to resist it. (Note, Matt. 26:40,41.) While, therefore, we wait for him who "cometh quickly," we should "hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end;" that none may rob us of "our crown," or even of the comfortable assurance of obtaining it. For those who overcome, in the strength and after the example of Christ, shall be placed by him as pillars in the temple above, to go no more out: and they shall for ever enjoy all the privileges and the felicity of the city of God, to the glory of the Father, and that of the eternal Son, who has redeemed them with his precious blood; that they may

V. 14—22. While we bow our ear to the encouraging topics of the gospel, let us advert also to the language of "the Amen, the true and faithful Witness," the Origin and Ruler of the "creation of God," whilst he speaks of the character and doom of lukewarm Christians. Alas! how many are there of the Laodicean stamp in every place! Did we suppose these epistles to be prophetical, as to the church in general, we might be induced to conclude, that the end of the world was nigh: for amidst the abounding of iniquity and infidelity, "the love of many waxes cold;" and the state of religion, (Note, Matt. 24:9—14.) even in this highly favoured nation, too much resembles that of this seventh church. The Lord knows, that very many professors of evangelical doctrine at present are "neither cold nor hot;" except as their indifference in essential matters is strangely counterpoised by a hot and fiery spirit of disputation about things of far inferior moment! No doubt the Laodicean state of the Christian churches, in most parts of the world, is one grand hinderance, nay, the grand hinderance of all, to the propagation of the gospel among the nations; who can scarcely conceive, that religion to be from heaven, the professors of which are so "earthly, sensual, devilish:" and certainly the state of those who "hold the truth," too often "in unrighteousness," and generally in a lukewarm manner, forms one grand objection and prejudice against the gospel, in the minds of numbers in this land; and gives moral and decent Infidels, Socinians, and Arians, their chief advantage against us. Yet the persons, who are chiefly reprehensible, are least likely to regard such admonitions: for whilst the Lord is saying, "I would thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth;" they are boasting "that they are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing!" It is indeed a general rule, that professors of religion grow proud, in proportion as they become carnal and formal: for, like glow-worms, they shine most in the dark, according to their apprehensions of themselves, and their commendations of one another. The Pharisaical spirit is indeed always odious and dangerous; whilst it renders men ignorant of their wretchedness, poverty, nakedness, and blindness, and insensible of the preciousness of Christ and his salvation: yet the legal Pharisee is a hopeful character, compared with those who graft the Pharisee on an evangelical profession, and strangely connect it with Antinomian principles and laxity of morals! The gracious Saviour, however, still continues to declare to all men their lost estate: and he mercifully counsels, even lukewarm and proud professors of the gospel, as well as others, to come and buy of him unsearchable and never failing treasures, unfading robes of righteousness, and that heavenly unction, which renders the most ignorant "wise unto eternal salvation." Happy are they who take his counsel! for all others must perish in their sins. Even when he enforces his neglected counsels and invitations, with sharp rebukes and painful corrections; (which he will do in respect of as many as he loves; Note, 1 Cor. 11: 29—34.) if we be thus made zealous and penitent, we shall deem them additional and most precious favours. May we then hear the voice of his word and his rod, while, with infinite compassion and condescension, he continues to stand waiting and knocking at the door of our hearts; that he may enter in, and bring salvation with him. Let us earnestly beseech him to put forth his almighty power, and thus break down all obstacles to his own admission; and so take entire possession of our whole souls: that we may be ashamed of our folly and ingratitude in allowing any creature to rival him in our affections, or attempting to divide our hearts between him and worldly objects. Then we may hope, that he will communicate his consolations to us, "fill us with peace and joy in believing, and cause us to abound in hope by the power of the Holy Spirit;" that he will "delight over us to do us good," and cause us to glory in him: and that, by his help, and under his banner, we shall conquer every enemy; till our blessed experience explains to us, that which we cannot possibly before understand, even what is meant by our "sitting down with him on his throne, even as he overcame, and is set down with the Father upon his throne."

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. When the Lord Jesus had dictated to his apostle the preceding epistles, and thus instructed him to write "the things which then were;" a short interruption of his visions seems to have taken place. But afterwards, looking and waiting for further discoveries, he beheld "a door opened in heaven," the holy habitation of God; and then another vision was introduced, which made way for his being shown "things which must be hereafter." (Note, 1:12—20.) For this chapter and the next constitute an introduction to the prophetical part of the book, especially to the "opening of the seals," in the sixth and seventh chapters.—While he was contemplating the "door opened in heaven," he heard a voice, as before, calling him to come up thither; and immediately he was "in the Spirit." (Note, 1:9—11.) It is not to be supposed, that any external objects were presented to the senses of the prophets on such occasions: but, the natural use of all their faculties being suspended, their minds were supernaturally impressed with the ideas of such things, as were particularly suited to illustrate the subjects, which they were employed to reveal. (Notes, Ez. 1:1—3. 8:1—4. 11:22—25. Acts 22:17—21. 2 Cor. 12:1—6.) It should not therefore be supposed, that the objects, afterwards mentioned, have a real existence in heaven: but they were visionary emblems, suited to give proper instruction to the apostle, and to his readers: and the chief business of the expositor is to develope the meaning of them, and, as it were, to read the hieroglyphics. "Being in the Spirit," and cast into an ecstacy, or trance, we may suppose that John did not well know "whether he were in the body, or out of the body:" He was, however, as to his own apprehension, admitted into the immediate presence of God, and had the vision of a glorious throne, on which One sat, whom he did not attempt to describe. This was emblematical of the universal, absolute, and eternal dominion of JEHOVAH; and of his exaltation far above all creatures, as their great Creator and Sovereign Lord. (Notes, 4—11. 5: 7:9—17. Is. 6:1—4. Ez. 1:26—28.) The visible glory, (which seems to have had some reference to the glory above the mercy-seat in the holy of holies, as there is throughout these visions an allusion to the temple, its furniture, and services,) being resplendent like the "jasper," might be emblematical of the perfect purity and excellency of the divine nature; and its colour like the red sardine stone, might represent his awful justice and fiery indignation. "The rainbow" was a well known emblem of the covenant of grace; (Notes, Gen. 9:9—17. Is. 54:6—10.) and, its surrounding the throne denoted, that the holiness and justice of God, and all his dispensations as the Sovereign of all worlds, had respect to his covenant of peace and engagements of love, which he had ratified to his believing people; and that it harmonized with them. In this rainbow, the soft green of the emerald was predominant: which perhaps might imply, that as the green relieves the eye, which some other colours fatigue and dazzle, so the discovery made of the mercy of God in the covenant of grace refreshes the believer's mind, which the display of his glorious power, holiness, and justice, would otherwise dismay and confound. On these subjects, the author writes with great diffidence. He conceives, that all the scriptural emblems have some distinct meaning, especially those of this book: but whether he has pointed out that meaning, or not, in general, and in particular instances, forms another question.—A door opened. (1) Note, 3:7. 5:1—10.

V. 4, 5. Round about, at some distance from the exalted throne of God, were placed twenty-four thrones, of an inferior order, on which were seated twenty-four elders. These are generally allowed to have been the emblematic representatives of the whole church of God, both under the old and the new dispensation. The thrones on which they sat, their white raiment, (Note, 3:4—6.) and their crowns of gold, implied their acceptance, sanctification, and royal priesthood. (Note, 1:4—6.) For, though the church militant was thus represented, as well as the church triumphant; yet the whole was described with relation to the security of the state of true Christians, their glorious privileges, and the honour to which the Lord purposed to advance them. The number of these elders may refer to the twenty-four courses, into which the priests were divided; (Notes, 1 Chr. 24:) or to the twelve patriarchs, and twelve apostles, as the heads of the Old and the New Testament churches. "The lightnings, thunders, and voices," which proceeded from the throne, according to the awful scene exhibited on mount Sinai, might imply, that God was as terrible as ever to the impenitent and unbelieving. Notes, 8:1—6. 11:19. Ex. 19:16—25. Heb. 12:18—21.)—The seven lamps of fire, burning before the throne," were emblematical of "the seven Spirits of God," or the manifold gifts and graces communicated to all Christians by the baptism of the Holy Spirit and of fire. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, 1:4—6. Matt. 3:11:12.)

V. 6—8. The "sea of glass, clear as crystal," being perfectly pure and transparent, (perhaps in allusion to the molten sea of brass in the court of the temple,) seems to refer to the "Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness," in which all the spiritual priesthood must wash, previously to their acceptable spiritual sacrifices. (Note, 15:1—4. Ex. 30:18—21. 1 Kings 7:23—39. Zech. 13:1.) Various opinions have been held concerning "the four beasts," or "living creatures;" as it certainly ought to have been translated, in order to adhere to the exact meaning of the original, and to preserve the truth of the emblem. The unaccountable notion, that the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead was represented by them, while two emblems were given of the Son, because of his incarnation and sacrifice, can have no other support than the names which have sanctioned it; for this plain reason; that "these living creatures" are, throughout, represented as the principal worshippers, not as the Object of worship. Nor can the far more general and plausible opinion, that they were representatives of the angels, as the cherubim in Ezekiel's vision evidently were, be supported by any sufficient proof: (Notes, Ez. 1:5—14. 10:1,2.) Angels indeed are personally introduced, in the subsequent part of this vision; but "these living creatures" are spoken of as adoring "the Lamb that was slain, who had redeemed them to God with his blood." (Note, 5:8—10.) They must therefore, undeniably, represent some part of the church of redeemed sinners, of the human race. Perceiving this, some expositors have supposed them to be representatives of the whole church, and the twenty-four elders of its rulers and pastors: but it is surely far more reasonable to reverse this arrangement, and to conclude that "the four living creatures" represent a part, the twenty-four elders the whole of the church, than that the larger number should represent only a part, and the smaller the whole. In short, it seems evident that they were emblems of the true ministers of Christianity, in the different parts of the earth, through successive generations.—Ezekiel, being about to predict providential dispensations respecting the nation of Israel, had a vision emblematical of the ministry of angels, by which those events would be accomplished: but John's predictions relating chiefly to the church in the different regions of the earth, and to the affairs of nations only in subserviency to it, he had a vision emblematical of the ministers of religion, by whom the interests of the church would principally be maintained. As the heavenly temper of mind, and the spiritual endowments which qualify men for this arduous work, accord in great measure, though in a far lower degree, to the affections and endowments of angels; it is not at all wonderful to find a coincidence in the hieroglyphics by which they were represented. But each cherub, in Ezekiel's vision, had four faces; while John's "living creatures" had the same four appearances, divided among them: for angels may be supposed to possess singly the several excellencies, which are given to many of the most eminent ministers.—In various particulars, the emblem teaches what true and able ministers are and do: and thus it serves to instruct and remind them of their important duties. "The lion" is the known emblem of courage and magnanimity: "the calf," or young ox, of strength, hardiness, and patient endurance of labour: "the human face" is the emblem of prudence, benevolence, and compassion: and "the eagle" of penetration, soaring beyond earthly things, contemplation of heavenly objects, and "affections fixed on things above." The six wings denote alacrity, humility, promptitude, and speed in the Lord's work. These "living creatures" were also "full of eyes" before, behind, and within; which aptly represented vigilance, circumspection, attention to their work and charge, watchful and cautious observance of the motions and stratagems of their enemies, self-acquaintance, and jealous diligence in searching their own hearts, and taking heed to their own spirits. Their unceasing and unwearied worship of the Lord, day and night, may signify, that through their instructions, exhortations, example, and assistance, converted sinners, in every part of the earth, from age to age, are continually blessing and glorifying God, and worshipping at his mercy-seat: and the three-fold repetition of the word holy, (as in the worship of the seraphim, in the above cited passage in Isaiah,) might be an intimation of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead; to which respect was had, which Person soever was immediately addressed. (Notes, 1:4—11. Is. 6:1—4. John 12:37—41.)

While these "four living creatures," ascribed glory and honour, and rendered thanks, to the eternal JEHOVAH, in the midst of the circuit of the throne, and nearer than the seats of the elders; (6) the four and twenty elders prostrated themselves before him in humble grateful adoration: and, in acknowledgment, that all their honour and felicity were bestowed on them of his mercy, they "cast their crowns before the throne;" and declared him to be worthy of all honour and dominion, as the great Creator of all worlds, by whose sovereign will they continued to exist, as they had been originally formed for his glory. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The Lord Jesus, 'having overcome the sharpness of death, hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers;' and if we look unto him by faith, and obediently attend to his voice, whilst he calls us to "set our affections on things above;" we shall, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, behold the glory of our reconciled God upon his "throne of grace;" be encouraged by the engagements of his everlasting covenant, and draw nigh in humble boldness with our worship; notwithstanding the terrors of his justice, and the awful curses of his broken law. For blessed are all they who belong to his church, in heaven, or on earth. Great is the honour and dignity conferred on them, or prepared for them; yea, far greater than all the thrones, sceptres, diadems, or triumphs, which have excited the ambition or envy of mankind in every age and place; and which have been sought by furious contests, and most horrible crimes, and through seas of human blood.—But our conflicts are of a more benign and benevolent kind, though generally requiring much self-denial and patience. If, however, we are baptized with the illuminating, purifying, and transforming influences of the Holy Spirit, washed in the pure fountain of the Redeemer's blood, and clothed in the sacerdotal robe of his righteousness; we shall ere long have done with conflict and suffering, receive the victor's honourable crown, and join in the rapturous adoration of the heavenly worshippers. (Notes, 7:13—17. P. O. 9—17.)

V. 6—11. Here on earth the Lord conducts the affairs of his church by his ministers, whom he has brought nearer to him than their brethren, and who ought to aspire after a proportionable pre-eminence in holiness. Many indeed bear that name, who are far from answering the scriptural character of ministers: and we all may learn, by these instructive emblems, what need we have to be humbled, and ashamed of our inconsistent conduct, and defective services: for though faithful ministers emulate the obedience of angels; yet they are conscious, that they "do not the things which they would." It behooves us, however, to look into this mirror, that we may learn "what manner of persons we ought to be," and what we are; and may thus know what to pray and strive for; that we may become more bold, laborious, loving, prudent, spiritual, active, vigilant, attentive to our own hearts, and devoted to the work of our gracious Lord. May he bless, uphold, encourage, and prosper all, who in any measure answer to these characters: may he raise up numbers of such ministers, in all the four quarters of the globe: and may he convert many blind guides into faithful pastors: and 'illuminate all bishops, priests, and deacons, with the true knowledge of his holy word.' Thus the worship of the church on earth, under the guidance and instruction of able and spiritual ministers, will become more like that of adoring seraphim: whilst the multitude of his people, in every place, as with one heart and voice, ascribe the whole honour of their redemption and conversion, their present privileges and future hopes, to the eternal and most holy God, who is "worthy to receive glory and dominion," as the Omnipotent Creator and Sustainer, and the Sovereign Lord of the whole universe. May the name of our "heavenly Father be" thus "hallowed, his kingdom come, his will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." Amen. (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The vision still continuing, the apostle next "saw a book in the right hand of him who sat upon the throne," (Note, 4:1—3.) which was "written within, and on the outside, and sealed with seven seals." (Note, Ez. 2:9,10.) It appeared as a roll, consisting of several parchments, according to the custom of those times: and though it was supposed to be written within, yet nothing could be read till the seals were loosed. It was afterwards found to contain seven parchments, or small volumes, each of which was separately sealed: but if all the seals had been on the outside, nothing could have been read till they had all been loosed; whereas the loosing of each seal was followed by some discovery of the contents of the roll: yet the appearance on the outside seems to have indicated, that it consisted of seven, or at least of several parts. This roll, however, was an emblem of the secret decrees and purposes of God, relative to future events, from which all prophecies are, as it were, extracts; but it represented especially those secret purposes of God which were about to be revealed; and it may therefore be considered as the same, for substance, with that part of this book of the Revelation, which follows. —A mighty angel, as the Lord's herald to all creatures, by proclamation, inquired who was "worthy," by his personal dignity or excellency, or the extraordinary services performed by him, to have the honour of opening this book. But there was no one, either angel in heaven, or man on earth, or spirit of man in the separate state, whose body lay under the earth, who could claim so high an honour; or so much as behold, and obtain the least insight into "the deep things of God" which it contained. (Notes, 11—14. Phil. 2:9—11.) When this was made known, the apostle, who had gone up thither, with earnest desires and expectations of hearing things, which should come to pass in after times, wept much at his supposed disappointment.

V. 5—7. One of the Elders, the emblematical representatives of the church, seemed to the apostle, in his vision, to notice his grief, and to encourage him with the assurance, that "the Lion of the tribe of Judah" had prevailed to open the book; being distinguished from all creatures, and honoured far above them all. A tradition has generally prevailed, that a lion was painted on the standard of Judah, when the nation of Israel encamped in the wilderness; but this is not at all probable. (Note, Num. 2:2.) Christ, however, was descended from Judah, and had been predicted under this emblem of a lion, in Jacob's blessing. (Notes, Gen. 49:8—10.) He was infinitely superior in dignity and power to all others of the tribe; and he is most terrible to his obstinate enemies, merciful to those who submit to him, and the guardian of his people: so that this title was peculiarly suited to him. He was described as "the Root of David:" in his human nature, he was "a Branch of renown," sprung up from the decaying Root of David's royal family; in respect of his Deity, he was the Root whence David himself sprang, and, as the promised Messiah, he was the great Honour, and the Source of all the dignity and authority of that distinguished race. (Notes, 22:16,17. Is. 11:1. Jer. 23:5,6. Matt. 22:41—46.) While the Elder was informing John, that Christ had prevailed to open the book; he looked, and saw with astonishment, that near to the throne, and within the circle formed by the living creatures and the elders; (Note, 4:4,5.) there stood "a Lamb, even as it had been slain," with the marks of the mortal wounds upon it, though it had been marvellously restored to life. (Notes, 8—14. 6:15—17 7:9—17. John 1:29.)

4 And I wept much, [f]because no man was found worthy to open, and to read the book, neither to look thereon.

5 And [h]one of the elders saith unto me, [i]Weep not: behold, [k]the Lion of the tribe of Juda, [l]the Root of David, [m]hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof.

6 And I beheld, and lo, [n]in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood [o]a Lamb as it had been slain, having [p]seven horns, and [q]seven eyes, which are [r]the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.

7 And he came and took the book [s]out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne.

[Practical Observations.]

8 And when he had taken the book, [t]the four beasts, and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, [u]having every one of them harps, [x]and golden vials full of [y]odours, which are [z]the prayers of saints.

9 And they [a]sung a new song, saying, [b]Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: [c]for thou wast slain, [d]and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood [e]out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And hast made us unto our God [f]kings and priests: [g]and we shall reign on the earth.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of [h]many angels round about [i]the throne, and the beasts and the elders: and the number of them [k]was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands o thousands;

12 Saying with a loud voice, [l]Worthy is the Lamb that was slain [m]to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory and blessing.

13 And [n]every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and [o]such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, [p]Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto [q]Him that sitteth upon the throne, [r]and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever.

14 And [s]the four beasts said, Amen. [t]And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped him that liveth for ever and ever.

This was an emblematical representation of the Saviour's High-Priesthood, before God, in our nature, as risen from the dead, through the merit of his Sacrifice, in behalf of "all who come to the Father through him;" so that it was in consequence of that atonement, which the sacrificing of spotless lambs had prefigured from the beginning, that he prevailed to open the book. "The seven horns" of this emblematical Lamb, represented the power of his providential kingdom, to protect his subjects, and annoy his enemies; and his "seven eyes" may denote his prophetical office, and his personal knowledge of all hearts and of all events; but especially, the "treasures of wisdom," laid up in him to be communicated to his church by "the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth;" that is, the Holy Spirit, as given by him to reveal the truth and will of God to apostles and prophets, that they might be written for the instruction of mankind; and as illuminating the understanding and preparing the hearts of his people to receive that instruction. (Notes, 1:4—6. 4:4,5.)—Several eminent expositors suppose, that seven superior angels, or archangels, are meant; but the text referred to, and the emblematical style of the book, are inconsistent with that interpretation. (Notes, 2 Chr. 16:7—10. Zech. 3: 9,10. 4:8—10. 6:1—8.)—This divine Saviour, however, approached to receive the book from "the hand of him that sat upon the throne."

V. 8—10. When Christ, as "the Lamb which had been slain," had received the book, and was preparing to loose "the seals," the "four living creatures, and the elders," who had before prostrated themselves in adoration of the great Creator, (Note, 4:9—11.) now fell down in like manner to worship the Lamb, or the incarnate Son, as the Saviour of sinners; thus rendering him divine honour, even in the presence of the Father's manifested glory. Their "harps" (with reference to the music and psalmody of the temple) were emblems of their melodious praises and thanksgivings: "the golden vials," or small censers or cups, full of odours, like the burning of incense at the tabernacle and temple, represented the acceptableness of the prayers of the saints, through the intercession of Christ, and by the influences of his sanctifying Spirit. (Note, Ps. 141:2.) These were presented by the living creatures and elders, as the prayers of Israel were offered, while the priests were burning incense in the sanctuary. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.) For though heaven is the scene of these visions: yet they had continual reference to the temple and its worship; and the state of the church on earth is throughout particularly adverted to. Moreover, they all joined in a song of praise, which was not only most excellent; but it was also new, in respect of the occasion and composition: for the Old Testament church celebrated the praises of JEHOVAH, their Redeemer from Egypt, and anticipated the coming of the expected Messiah; but the New Testament church adored Christ, as actually come, as having finished his work on earth by his sacrifice on the cross, and as entered into his mediatorial glory. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 7:9—12. 14:1—5. 15:1—4.) He, therefore, and he alone was worthy to take the book, and disclose the purposes of God to mankind; for he had become incarnate, and, for the glory of God, and the salvation of men, had willingly given himself to be slain as a Sacrifice. Thus "he had redeemed them to God," by the shedding of his all-atoning blood; that he might bring them, as reconciled and accepted worshippers, into his presence; and he had collected them, by the preaching of the gospel and the power of his grace, out of the various families, languages, and nations of the world, to be exalted and consecrated, "as kings and priests," through their union with him and conformity to him: they were therefore assured, that even on earth they should acquire the ascendancy both over their personal enemies, and those of his church, as well as "reign with him for ever in heaven:" (Note, 1:4—6.) and that their cause also would finally triumph on earth. (Notes, 18:—20:1—6.)—It is indisputably manifest, that the "four living creatures" join in, or rather lead, the worship of the Lamb, as "having redeemed them to God:" and this proves beyond controversy, that part of the redeemed church is meant by this emblem; and not angels, whose worship is next described, but in language evidently different. (Notes, 11—14. 4:4—11.)—Every kindred. (9) Note, 7:9—12.

V. 11—14. While these adoring praises were rendered, by the representatives of the church of redeemed sinners, to their divine Saviour; the apostle heard likewise "the voice of many angels round about the throne," and encircling without the living creatures and elders; whose number amounted to many millions, and could not be ascertained. Yet they all, in perfect harmony, with a loud voice of adoration confessed, that "the Lamb, who had been slain," for the redemption of sinful men, was "worthy to receive power," in his mediatorial character, and in human nature, over all creatures in heaven and earth; and "riches," even all the treasures of grace and glory, for the benefit of his people; and that "wisdom, strength, honour, glory, and blessing," should be vested in him and ascribed to him, as the Object of universal adoration, praise, gratitude, and admiring love. Thus "the innumerable company of angels," though they do not stand related to the Saviour as partakers of the same nature, and have no immediate concern in his redemption, are yet represented, as beholding such divine excellency and glory in him, and his mediatorial work, (for "into these things they desired to look,") that they adore and honour him with most rapturous ascriptions of praise; rejoice in his exaltation "far above all principality and power," and his authority in human nature over all of them; and seemed to vie with redeemed sinners in his worship! (Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—In this they were immediately joined by all the inhabitants of heaven and earth, and the souls of those in the separate state, whose bodies were under the earth, or in the sea; or by all creatures in the universe, according to their several capacities, with the exception of none but the determined enemies of God. (Notes, Ps. 148:) These, indeed the nature of the case, and the whole tenor of Scripture, as well as other visions in this book, necessarily exclude; yet they too, though reluctantly, shall bow to Christ, and be put under his feet. (Notes, Is. 45:20—25. Rom. 14: 10—12. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Phil. 2:9—11.) All the rest, however, rendered and ascribed "blessing and honour and glory to him that sat on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever;" to which "the four living creatures" joined a cordial "Amen." Thus the whole church, by its representatives, fell down and worshipped the eternal God. to be worshipped, equally with the Father, by all creatures, to all eternity? Will any one, after reading this, assert that he is a mere Man, or a created Being? or that it is idolatry to worship him? Or will such persons profess to believe, that this book is the unerring word of God? If they waver as to this point, can they disprove the divinity of a book, the prophecies of which have already been so remarkably accomplished? Or can any man, who opposes the worship of Christ, or the doctrines of his Deity and atonement, and of salvation through faith in his blood, suppose that he can ever enter heaven? or, if this might be, that he could join in the work and worship of that blessed world, or even so much as endure it?—But there can be no dissentients, no discordant voices, in that world of light and love! PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. How vain and presumptuous must all man's endeavours be, to discover future events, beyond the discernment of a sagacious probable conjecture, or as instructed by "the sure word of prophecy:" seeing that all things respecting the future are sealed up in impenetrable secrecy; and no creature in heaven, earth, or hell, is able or worthy to disclose the least tittle of them, except the incarnate Son of God alone! We need not indeed weep, that we cannot foresee the future events respecting ourselves in this world: as the eager expectation and prospect of distant prosperity would unfit us for present duties and conflicts; and the foresight of future calamities would render our most prosperous days distressing. Yet in this distracted evil world, we may properly desire to learn, from the promises and prophecies of Scripture, what will be the final event to believers, and to the church; and, in both respects, the Incarnate Son has prevailed to procure us all the information which our circumstances need. May we then value, and study to become acquainted with, every part of that revelation which he has given us.—What apparently contrary excellencies centre in our Redeemer's character! "The Lion of the tribe of Judah," is also a meek and spotless Lamb, and a bleeding Sacrifice for sin: and while as a Lion he protects his people, even as a Lamb he is most formidable to his obstinate enemies. (Note, 6:15—17.) The whole universe could never, in any other instance, show such a union of unsearchable riches and deep poverty, of sovereign authority and willing entire subjection, of divine dignity and immense humiliation and condescension, of majesty and meekness, of holiness and love of sinners, of justice and mercy, of desert of honour and happiness, with patient endurance of most complicated sufferings. In these, and various other respects, he is altogether worthy of our admiration, confidence, and imitation, as far as it is possible for us to be placed in similar circumstances.

V. 8—14. As the omnipotent and omniscient Lord of all, our gracious Saviour, rules all things by his universal providence, and the energy of his omnipresent Spirit, in subserviency to his great concern of "redeeming us to God with his blood." His faithful ministers, therefore, through all the earth, while they instruct men to worship the Creator and Governor of the world; will also excite them, by their doctrine and example, most humbly to adore "the Lamb that was slain;" and to present their loudest, sweetest songs of praise to him, in and through whom "the prayers of the saints" ascend as incense before the throne of God. He is worthy to reveal and to direct the dispensations of Providence; yea, he is entitled to universal adoration: and if all the angels of God with one voice proclaim, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive authority, riches, wisdom, honour, glory, and blessing;" and if all holy and accepted creatures, in the whole universe, give the same "blessing, and honour, and glory, to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever," surely they, "whom he hath redeemed to God with his blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation," of the earth should cordially say Amen to it! Can we allow those persons to be his ministers and disciples, who refuse that honour to him, which all obedient creatures render him without one discordant voice? If it were possible for true Christians to refuse these adora-tions to the eternal Son of the Father, "even the very stones would cry out" in abhorrence of man's ingratitude to him, who stooped so low for their salvation. We cannot err in adoring him, "whom all the angels of God worship." Thus we shall most acceptably "glorify him, that liveth for ever and ever," and be trained up for the work and joy of heaven; for which no sinner is qualified, who cannot cordially join "the new song" of the redeemed, and ascribe "salvation, and glory, and blessing, to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for evermore." Amen.

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. It is generally agreed, that this chapter relates to the events which took place from the time of the vision, to the establishment of Constantine the great upon the Imperial throne, as the first Christian emperor: by which the persecutions of Pagan Rome ceased, and Christianity became the established and favoured religion, throughout the empire.—When the Lord Jesus, as "the Lamb that had been slain," "opened the first seal," the apostle's attention was excited, by a voice like thunder; and one of "the four living creatures," called on him to come and see what passed. This was the voice of him who was "like a lion:" and the same took place, respecting the other living creatures in their order, after the opening of the next three seals; but the meaning of the emblem does not clearly appear. (Note, 4:6—8.)—The apostle then beheld, with astonishment, "a white horse," on which One was mounted, armed with a bow, as for the battle: to him "a crown," denoting royal authority, was given, and he went forth conquering all who opposed him, and still preparing to obtain new victories. (Notes, 19:11—16. Ps. 45:3—5. Zech. 9:13—16.)—Those who suppose the apostle to have had this vision in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 68, explain this emblem of the victories gained by Vespasian and Titus, among which the taking and destruction of Jerusalem was most considerable. But it is almost incredible, that this most important event should be only thus obscurely hinted at; if it had been then in futurity: and it is far more likely, that the apostle wrote this book a considerable time after that event. Others, therefore, explain this discovery of some victories, obtained by the Emperor Trajan, over the surrounding nations: but these events had no immediate connexion with the affairs of the church; and Trajan, who was a persecutor, however celebrated in other respects, was not aptly described by one mounted "on a white horse." (Notes, Zech. 1:7—11. 6:1—8.) This emblem rather denotes righteousness and purity: and the mild beneficent victories of Christ, by his word and Holy Spirit, in the conversion of sinners to "the obedience of faith," seem to have been thus predicted. After his advancement to his mediatorial throne, he had gone forth, as a merciful and beneficent Conqueror, and had obtained many victories: but both Jews and Gentiles opposed the progress of his gospel; yet the opening of this seal, showed that he would still go on with his conquests, and more widely than ever extend his spiritual dominion. Accordingly, accurate historians are of opinion, that Christianity spread more rapidly and extensively among the Gentiles just after this time, than it had before done.—A crown, &c. (2) 14:14. 17:12. Matt. 28:18.

To conquer. (2) Ἱνα νικηση. That he might conquer, or add to his conquests. (Notes, Ps. 110:)

V. 3, 4. The "red horse," which appeared at the opening of the second seal, leads our thoughts to wars and conquests of another nature than those before considered. The Lord Jesus, in his righteous providence, seems to be here represented, as commissioning and employing the executioners of his vengeance on his obstinate enemies. (Marg. Ref i. l.) Accordingly historians record, that insurrections, bloody battles, massacres, and devastations of a most extraordinary kind, took place, between A. D. 100 and A. D. 138. Five hundred and eighty thousand Jews are computed to have been slaughtered in different places during that period; and even a larger number of the Romans and Greeks seem to have been butchered by them, in the most barbarous manner imaginable. So that the two parties of the enemies of Christ and the gospel, the Jews and idolaters, seemed to vie with each other, in executing his righteous vengeance on their competitors. Thus the instruments of his indignation were empowered "to take peace from the earth," and to set men on to kill one another, and "a great sword," of war and slaughter, was put into their hand. (Notes, Is. 10:5—15. Jer. 27:4—9 51:20—24. Ez. 30:20—26.)—Some make this period to have lasted longer than is above stated; but such difficult questions cannot be particularly discussed, in this compendious view of these comprehensive prophecies.

V. 5, 6. "The black horse," which appeared on the opening of the third seal, was a proper emblem of calamity and mourning: and the balances in the hand of the rider denoted, that in the times referred to there would be a great scarcity of provisions; so that men would have their food weighed out to them, with great exactness, as it is done when any company is reduced to short allowance. (Lev. 26:26. Note, Ez. 4:9—17.) The voice also, which proclaimed the price of corn, has the same meaning; though to an English reader it seems to denote the contrary. For the measure specified, according to the most accurate calculation, held no more than the usual daily allowance for bread to a labouring man, or even to a slave; and the penny, or denarius, (about seven-pence half-penny,) was commonly his day's wages. (Matt. 20:2.—Table of Money.) If then a poor man could only earn enough to buy a sufficient quantity of bread for himself, without any other necessary of life; to what straits must he be reduced, in endeavouring to sustain a family! The barley indeed was stated to have been much cheaper: but then it is much less serviceable for bread; and the poor could not possibly have obtained more than a bare subsistence, on the meanest food, without reserving any thing for raiment, or other necessaries.—Yet the orders given to the emblematical executioner of this sentence, to "spare the oil and the wine," may imply, that there should not be a total failure of the fruits of the earth. Perhaps the luxuries were not so much injured as the bread corn. (Note, Gen. 43:11,12.)—This seal is supposed, by some expositors, to have reached from A. D. 138 to A. D. 193; though others state it differently. There is, however, no material disagreement between them; and there are accounts, in the history of those years, of long continued scarcities, through the whole Roman empire; during which, all the care of the emperors and their ministers, could only just prevent the horrors of entire famine.—This was another method by which Christ fought against the persecutors of his church.

A measure. (6) Χοινιξ. Rather more than a quart. See Table of Measures.

V. 7, 8. The pale horse, which appeared at the opening of the fourth seal, on which Death rode as a terrific conqueror, followed by hell, (or the grave, and the state of departed souls,) to seize on the dead, was an apt emblem of the several divine judgments, which are afterwards enumerated; and through which, it is said, that "power was given to death and hell," over the fourth part of the earth; or a large proportion of its inhabitants, especially throughout the whole Roman empire. Some expositors make this seal to reach from A. D. 193 to A. D. 270: others include only 50 years of that time under it. However, within the shorter period, there were more than twenty Roman emperors, who for a time ruled with great power, and most of them with great tyranny and cruelty, as long as their dominion continued: there were also above thirty usurpers in different parts of the empire, who supported their claims by war, and perished with multitudes of their adherents. Amidst such intestine convulsions and fierce contests within the several provinces of the empire, "death on his pale horse" must have destroyed immense numbers with the sword. This universal war and confusion, by taking men off from the cultivation of the earth, and destroying the fruits of it when produced, naturally made way for famine; which grievously prevailed in every place. The scanty, low, and unwholesome diet occasioned by hunger or famine, naturally introduced pestilence, which is often called death by the eastern writers: and the most learned men have declared, that so extensive and destructive a pestilence, as that which during this period wasted the empire for fifteen years together, is not met with in universal history. These desolations must also have given opportunity to wild beasts to increase upon the residue of the inhabitants; and accordingly we read, that they were forced to wage war with wolves, lions, and tigers, and that many were devoured by them. (Notes, Ez. 5:14—17. 14:13—21.)

V. 9—11. On the opening of the fifth seal, the apostle observed "under the altar," (for there is a continual reference to the appearance of the divine glory in the sanctuary, and to the peculiarities of the Jewish worship, Notes, Is. 6: 1—8.) "the souls of those" persons, "who had been slain" for believing and obeying the word of God, and "for the testimony which they" had borne to the truth of the gospel. These appeared as sacrifices, which had newly been offered; to show their fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, (Note, 5:5—7.) and the acceptableness of their faithfulness unto death, through his propitiatory oblation: for it is probable that the altar of burnt-offering is intended; though some understand it of the golden altar for incense, within the sanctuary. These souls appear to have represented, not only such persons as had suffered martyrdom before the apostle had this vision; but the whole multitude, who were slain previous to the prophetical period referred to, beginning about A. D. 270. They however, with one consent and a loud voice, inquired of the Lord, as "holy and faithful," or "the holy and the true One," (Note, 3:7.) how long he would endure the provocations of the persecutors, before he proceeded to judge their cause, and avenge their blood on the inhabitants of the earth, by the subversion of the persecuting power of Pagan Rome. This was the language of their zeal for the honour of God, and their desire of the prevalence of the gospel. (Notes, 18:20. Deut. 32:34,35. Ps. 94:1—7. Rom. 12:17—21.) The "white robes given" to each of them denoted, that they were immediately admitted into a state of felicity, as accepted and holy: but they were required to "rest," and wait a short space for "the avenging of their blood;" as there were many others of their brethren who would suffer death in the same cause, before the purposes of God respecting the destruction of their persecutors were fulfilled. (Notes, 7:13—17. 12:7—12 18:20. 19:1—6.)—'Mr. Lowman observes very well, that this representation seems much to favour the immediate happiness of departed saints, and hardly to consist with that uncomfortable opinion, the insensible state of departed souls, till after the resurrection.' Bp. Newton.—This seal seems to have been a prediction of the terrible persecution of the church, under Dioclesian, which reached much further, and was far more bloody, than any of those that had preceded it. The fury of it lasted for ten years, which was called by Christians, 'The Era of martyrs;' but this seal is supposed by some expositors to relate to the whole time between A. D. 270 and 304.—Here also there are immaterial differences of opinion among learned men: and as so many interesting events are hinted at in a few verses; it can scarcely be supposed that, after many centuries, we should be able to determine these matters with exactness; especially as the historians of those times were uncommonly inaccurate and confused in their writings.

revolutions, in the civil and religious state of the world, attended with vast commotions of every kind. The extreme "blackness of the sun," and "the moon becoming blood," denote the extinction, with horror and bloodshed, of the most exalted and conspicuous persons, such as the emperors and their chief ministers, officers, and nobles: the "falling of the stars," was emblematical of the degradation, or death, of illustrious persons in great numbers, such as magistrates and senators. The departure of the heaven, like the "rolling up of a parchment" to be laid aside; and the removal of the mountains and islands, seem to have represented the total subversion of the Pagan persecuting dominion, by the victories of Constantine, and by his accession to the imperial throne; and the entire and universal change which took place at that time. 'The great lights of the heathen world, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were all eclipsed and obscured, the heathen emperors and Cesars were slain, the heathen priests and augurs were extirpated, the heathen officers and magistrates were removed; the heathen temples were demolished, and their revenues were appropriated to better uses.' Bp. Newton. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Is. 13:9, 10. Jer. 4:19—27. Ez. 33:7,8. Matt. 24:29—35.)—Such bold metaphorical descriptions of great revolutions abound in the prophecies of Scripture: for these events are emblems and anticipations of the end of the world, and the day of judgment: nor could any revolution be more properly represented by this language, than the entire and final subversion of the greatest fabric of Pagan idolatry, tyranny, and persecution, which ever existed on earth. (Note, 20:11—15.)

Earthquake. (12)κ Σεισμος. See on Matt. 8:24. The similitude of the figs, in a strong wind, falling from the fig-tree, is highly energetic.

V. 15—17. This unexpected change would throw all the persecuting and opposing party into the utmost consternation and despair: and the apostle, in his vision, saw them all, even the slaves and freedmen, as well as the kings, captains, and great or rich men, endeavouring to shelter themselves in dens and caverns, and vehemently wishing to be crushed by rocks and mountains; if that might but cover them from the power and manifested presence of God, and from "the wrath of the Lamb," whose gospel they had opposed, and whose servants they had persecuted. For the prevalence of Christianity, and the accession of a Christian emperor, would lead them to conclude with desperation, that Jesus was indeed the Lord; that the time was come when he would take full vengeance on his enemies; and that none could resist him, escape from him, or pacify him. (Notes, 9:6. Josh. 10:16—18. Is. 2:19—22. Hos. 10:7,8. Luke 23:26—31.)—The series of prophetic events requires us to interpret this seal, of the victories and accession of Constantine; when the Christian church gained a complete triumph over the persecuting power of Pagan Rome: but the passage may profitably be accommodated to the day of judgment. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. 21:8—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The ministers of the gospel ought to call men's attention to the prophecies of Scripture, and to the events in Providence which accomplish them.—The victories of our exalted Redeemer, by the preaching of the gospel, in bringing "the nations to the obedience of faith," have been and will be progressive, till his cause be universally triumphant, we should therefore rejoice to be in any way instrumental in promoting these beneficent conquests; and our prayers, that "he may still go forth, conquering and to conquer," should continually be presented before "the throne of grace."—But he fights in another manner against the despisers of his salvation, and the opposers of his glory: he can raise up and employ sanguinary potentates, or insurgents, to execute his vengeance on his enemies; (Note, Matt. 22:1—10.) and when he gives them power, and leaves them to their "own hearts' lust," they soon excite multitudes to kill one another by "the force of the sword." He can also withhold the influences of the heavens, and restrain the earth from yielding its increase; and so visit the nations with distressing scarcity, or destructive famine: and death, when commissioned by him, marches forth on "his pale horse," and pestilences sweep away millions into the grave, and their eternal state; till at length the beasts of the earth seem to acquire the dominion of the desolated lands, and add to the miseries of the few remaining inhabitants. How mad must it then be for the potsherds of the earth to contend against his iron rod!—But let us be thankful for our exemption, in this highly favoured land, from these dire calamities, and for our peace, liberty, plenty, and manifold advantages; and let the rich be reminded, even in times of comparative scarcity, to give more liberally to the relief of their poor neighbours, and needlessly spend much less on themselves. In these temporal judgments, the Lord in wrath remembers mercy; and even his own people also partake of many of the calamities, in addition to the persecutions which they often endure; but he will be with them, and cause all to "work together for their good;" and bring them forth out of them, as gold purified in the furnace.

V. 9—17. Multitudes have already been "slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held constantly" to the truth; and many more will, probably, be thus killed, before his purposes shall be accomplished. But the Lord himself is the Comforter of his afflicted servants: "precious is their blood in his sight;" and their patience unto death in his cause, is a sacrifice most honourable, and therefore most "acceptable, to him through Jesus Christ." Their enemies can "only kill the body:" then "the Lord delivereth them out of all their troubles;" "white robes" of joy and triumph "are given to every one of them;" they enter into immediate rest; and, after a short season, "the earth shall disclose their blood," and the vengeance which is written will be executed on all their impenitent persecutors, by the holy and faithful Lord of all. (Notes, Ps. 149:7—9. Is. 26:20, 21.) He has gained many signal victories over the most powerful enemies of his church; and vast revolutions, and convulsions in empires, have been effected, in order to the establishment of Christianity, in defiance of opposing princes and nations: yet hitherto the commanders in this contest have rallied their scattered troops, and returned to the desperate charge. But he will shortly gain a more decided, universal, and durable victory, than any which he has yet obtained: and with more terrible destruction to the armies of the aliens. (Notes, 19:11—21.) And if, on such occasions, the most powerful kings, and valiant captains, and all other opposers of his power, are so dismayed, as to hide themselves in dens and caverns; what will the terror of the wicked be at the day of judgment, when the sun and moon shall literally be turned into darkness; when the heavens and earth shall become one common conflagration, till "they pass away, and no place be found for them;" and when the great day of the wrath of the Lamb will indeed be come, and none of his enemies will be able to abide it! In vain will they then "call to the rocks and mountains to hide them from him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb;" from which none will be preserved, except that despised company, who have here believed, loved, and obeyed him. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but his words shall not pass away." Be wise now, therefore, O "ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the earth; serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish." (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12.) And may all those who "look for such things be diligent, that they may be found of him in peace without spot, and blameless." (Note, 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)

NOTES—CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. This chapter is a continuation of the sixth seal. (Notes, 6:12—17. 8:1—6.)—The "four angels, standing on the four corners of the earth," represent the instruments of Providence throughout the nations, in all parts of the earth: and their "restraining the winds," that no destructive tempests might be excited by land or sea, is supposed to be an emblem of the tranquillity of the Roman empire, and of all nations, subsequent to Constantine's accession to the imperial throne; which was the more delightful, as it succeeded such long-continued and terrible convulsions and desolations.—At the same time, "another angel came up from the east." This angel seems to have been an emblem of Christ himself; for who else could have "the seal of the living God," even the Holy Spirit, by which his people are "sealed unto the day of redemption?" (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21

22. Eph. 1:13,14. 4:30—32.)—By his gospel, he came from the eastern nations, where his religion was first published; as the rising sun proceeds from east to west: and he diffused that heavenly light to the western, or European provinces of the empire, and accompanied it by his new creating Spirit; and thus "sealed" great numbers as "the servants of God." This great "Angel of the covenant," as one having sovereign authority, called to the other angels, to whom a commission had been given, to bring calamities on mankind by land and sea; ordering them not to execute it, till he and his ministers, as the instruments of his grace, had sealed the "servants of God in the forehead;" that they might be evidently distinguished from others, and so be preserved during the approaching calamities. This signified, that great numbers would be baptized, and profess themselves disciples of Christ, during the happy tranquillity which followed Constantine's accession; and that very many would be really converted, and renewed to the image of God, by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit.—The gospel was very extensively preached during this period, and immense multitudes embraced Christianity. The favour, indeed, shown to the converts to Christianity, in an indiscriminate and injudicious manner, induced numbers from secular motives to profess themselves Christians; and thus tended greatly to fill the church with hypocrites, which introduced a worldly spirit, and at length caused manifold evils: yet this prophecy fully proves, that real religion was at first greatly promoted by the advancement of a Christian emperor; and that it obtained an establishment in many places, which before had little regarded it.—'I saw another Angel, even the great Angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, ascending up from the eastern coast, where Jerusalem stood; who, by virtue of his Mediatorship, had in his hand that Seal, or mark of the living God, which in his eternal decree is set upon his elect, whereby they are sealed both to salvation in the end, and to a gracious protection till then: who did, by the mighty voice of his word, command these four angels, ... saying, Hold your hands, &c.' Bp. Hall. (Notes, 9:3—5. Ez. 9:1—7.)

V. 4—8. This account of the numbers sealed from the twelve tribes, cannot be understood in a literal sense; for if we explain it exclusively of converts from the nation of Israel, it can hardly be supposed, that exactly the same number of each tribe was sealed. But Israel was the ancient people of God, which after some generations was incorporated as a church and a nation: and the Christian church, which succeeded to it, had, after a long time, supplanted both the Mosaic dispensation, and the idolatry of Pagan Rome, and acquired an establishment upon the ruins of them. For the times of Constantine seem intended. (Note, 6:12—14.) As therefore the tribes of Israel were numbered, after they were formed into a nation; so the numbers added to the church, in consequence of this establishment, were figuratively declared to be one hundred and forty-four thousand, or twelve times twelve thousand; a large definite number, probably, being put for an indefinite: and this being divided into twelve parts, one of them was assigned to each of the tribes of Israel; intimating that these persons succeeded to their privileges and occupied their place: for, I apprehend the Gentile converts, as well as those of Israel, were intended, (Note, 9—12.) since none else are mentioned as having been sealed.—The tribes are here arranged differently than in any other place. Judah is placed first, in honour of Christ who sprang from him: Dan is wholly omitted, perhaps because idolatry was first publicly established by that tribe. (Notes, Judg. 18:) Others, however, think that the tribe of Dan had long before become nearly extinct: and, indeed, the tribe is not expressly mentioned in the genealogies contained in the first of Chronicles. Levi is numbered with the rest; and Joseph is placed instead of Ephraim, while Manasseh is likewise continued. The order of primogeniture is neglected; nor is any regard shown to the children of the freewomen, above those of the bondwomen, as both are alike in Christ.—No satisfactory reason for these variations can be assigned. (Gen. 29:32—35. 30:1—22. 49: Num. 1: 26: Deut. 33:)

V. 9—12. Many expositors suppose, that the preceding verses relate exclusively to the Jewish converts, who were at this time added to the church; and that these refer to the Gentiles who embraced the gospel during the same period; and others explain them of the peace and prosperity of the church during those days. But it appears to me evident, that the happy estate of those, who had adhered to Christ during the preceding calamities, and had been "faithful unto death," was intended: for though they had been slain, or had otherwise been removed, before the favourable change took place; they were by this no losers, nay, exceedingly benefited: and the language of the subsequent verses is so energetic, that nothing short of heavenly felicity can answer to it. (Note, 13—17.)—A multitude so large, that no man could number it, collected from the several nations of the earth known in those days, appeared to "stand before the throne," as accepted worshippers of God; and "before the Lamb," as his redeemed people. (Notes, 5:8—10. 19:1—6.) This view and interpretation give us enlarged conceptions of the success of the gospel, during the first three centuries; and may encourage the hope, that vast numbers lived by obedient faith, and died in Christ, unknown to history; notwithstanding the lamentable account transmitted to us, of the heresies, contentions, and corruptions, which prevailed at that early period. For these form by far the most prominent subjects in the ecclesiastical records of those times.—Every one of this company was "clothed in white robes," as perfectly justified, sanctified, and made happy in heaven. (Notes, 3:4—6. 6:9—11. 19:7,8. Ps. 51:7. Is. 1:16—20. 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) They had also been engaged in war: as victors, they carried the well known emblem of palm branches: and having obtained complete salvation, in respect of their souls, they ascribed it in no degree to themselves, or to their own wisdom, strength, labours, services, sufferings, or martyrdom; but gave the whole glory of it to their God and Father, who was seated "on the throne," as being the effect of his unmerited love and grace; "and unto the Lamb," as it was entirely bestowed on them through his atonement and mediation. While these redeemed sinners stood next to the throne, and led the worship of heaven, in virtue of their union with the incarnate Son of God; the angels, free from the least emotion of envy, and rejoicing in their exaltation, and the glory of God in it, stood without the circle, made by the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers, and in prostrate adoration added their cordial Amen, to the praises rendered to God and the Lamb. They then showed their delight in that solemn and rapturous worship, by ascribing "blessing and glory to" their God and Portion, as the Fountain of all excellency and felicity; celebrating his manifold wisdom in these surprising events; joining their thanksgivings to those of redeemed sinners; rendering him the honour of all his wonderful works; and rejoicing that power and might belonged to him for ever and ever. This,

13 And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they?

14 And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.

16 They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.

17 For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

V. 13—17. The scene, thus presented to the apostle's mind, related to events which did not occur till above two hundred years afterwards, namely, in the time of Constantine: as he was, therefore, receiving prophetical information, one of the representatives of the universal church inquired of him, whether he knew who they were, thus "arrayed in white robes," or whence they came. And the apostle having respectfully replied, that he was persuaded the elder well knew, thus intimating his desire of instruction; he was shown, that "these were persons who had come out of great tribulation."—This could not be meant of the Gentiles, converted to Christianity after the accession of Constantine; for they had come out of no great tribulation peculiar to them rather than others: and though it might be accommodated to the state of the church at large in those peaceful days, which had succeeded to a season of extreme tribulation; yet it far more aptly and emphatically represented the case of those multitudes, who had been "faithful unto death," amidst the harassing persecutions of the foregoing ages. (Notes, 6:9—11. Acts 14:19—23. 1 Thes. 3:1—5. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.)—They had, indeed, been "in great tribulation," from many causes, but they were now come forth out of it; and their sorrows and sufferings were finished and terminated for ever.—They were attired "in white robes:" but their robes had not always been white; for they had "washed them and made them white." This they had effected, not by their repentance, or forms, or services, or acts of charity; no, not by their labours and sufferings for the gospel, or their blood shed in martyrdom: but they had washed their robes from the guilt and pollution which had contaminated them, "in the blood of the Lamb;" by faith in his atoning sacrifice and prevailing intercession, and by trusting in his name for the mercy and grace, which he died to procure for sinners; and by living by the sanctification of his Spirit unto obedience. "Therefore" they had found acceptance with God, and admission into heaven, and "stood before the throne;" where with unceasing, yea, continually augmented pleasure, they served and worshipped God "day and night;" (Notes, Ps. 134: Heb. 4:3—11, v. 9.) whilst he graciously dwelt among them as their Father and Friend, overshadowing them with his presence, and filling them with ineffable and rapturous joy. Thus, by his love, and the displays of his glory, all their thirstings after him and holiness were fully satisfied; nor were they troubled with one desire of any other or greater happiness, than they securely enjoyed. (Notes, Matt. 5:6. Luke 16:24—26. John 4:10—15. 6:30—35.) Neither were they exposed to any affliction, temptation, fear, or persecution, (like the heat of the noonday sun;) as all these were finally passed away. (Notes, Ps. 121:5—8. Is. 26:3—6. 32:1,2. Matt. 13:3—8.20,21.) For "the Lamb who redeemed them to God with his blood;" and who, in consequence of his victory, was seated with his Father upon his throne, employed his power and authority in satisfying and anticipating all their wants, and conducting them to the inexhaustible Fountain-head of unalloyed felicity; whilst the eternal Father, as "delighting over them to do them good," "wiped away all tears from their eyes," and turned their former sorrows into the fulness of eternal joy. (Notes, 21:1—4,22—27. 22:1—5. Is. 25:6—9. 60:15—22.)—Nothing on earth can fully answer to such language as this: and indeed the prosperity of the church at the time predicted, very soon terminated as a dream; (Notes, 12.) and cannot be reasonably considered, as exclusively, or primarily, nor indeed at all intended, by this most energetic and rapturous language. But such a view of the immediate felicity of those, who followed Christ faithfully in the predicted season of persecution, was very proper to reconcile the minds of Christians to their trials, and to animate them to face death in its most terrifying forms. Accordingly, the church, during these times, seems to have studied this book more, and even to have understood this first part of it far better, than Christians in succeeding generations have generally done.—"With God is the Fountain of life:" but it is "the Lamb that was slain," who "leads sinners unto that Fountain of living waters." (Note, 22:1.)—Washed, &c. (14) How could such an idea ever enter the human mind, as washing linen garments in blood, and so rendering them white; apart from the doctrine of the atonement, and the efficacy of faith in that atonement, to cleanse the soul from sin? (Notes, 1:4—6. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. 1 John 1:5—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The intervals of peace on earth are caused by a positive divine interposition, to restrain the furious passions of men, and the agency of Satan; which at all times naturally tend to confusion, discord, mischief, and misery.—When the Lord Jesus sees good to grant his church seasons of rest, and to raise up men endued with authority, to countenance and concur in promoting the gospel; he commonly "seals" many by his converting grace, "unto the day of redemption:" (Note, Acts 9:31.) But human depravity, and the artifices of Satan, often pervert peaceful and prosperous days into an occasion of negligence and hypocritical profession; and this makes way for the ministering angels being again commissioned to bring calamities upon the earth. Nothing, however, can finally hurt those, who are "sealed by the Spirit:" nor let it be deemed futile to observe, that this seal must be "on the forehead," visible both to friends and foes, but not to the believer himself, except as he looks steadfastly in the glass of God's word. (Notes, Ez. 9:1—7. P. O.)—It is encouraging to those, who are decidedly on the Lord's part in this evil world, to hear of the increase of "the true Israel of God:" and they will pray him to add to their numbers "a hundred fold more, how many soever they be:" and, though they, who offer these fervent prayers, may not live to witness this blessed change, they must exult to recollect what multitudes are gone before them to heaven; and what accessions are daily making to the number from all the nations of the earth; and what glorious times are coming, according to the sure word of prophecy.

V. 9—17. The few believers, who are scattered abroad in this world, seem a solitary and singular remnant, and as such are generally despised: yet they have innumerable friends and coadjutors, with whom they will shortly and for ever be united. The whole multitude, who now stand before the throne of God, with all that ever shall be saved, were once "dead in sin" and exposed to wrath; but they were taught their guilt and danger, and led to trust in the Lamb of God. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Eph. 2:1—10.) Thus they began to fight the good fight of faith, against Satan, the world and sin; amidst many fears, sorrows, and temptations: at length they obtained "the garments of joy," and the palm of victory; and now they ascribe all their "salvation to God, and to the Lamb;" while adoring angels delight to swell the chorus of their joyful thanksgivings. Could we ascend into heaven, and inquire, "who they are that are arrayed in white robes, and whence they came;" amidst ten thousand differences in other matters, we should learn that every one of them had come out of sorrow, and out of sin; that they had all been in conflict and tribulation; and that they had all "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."—Not one discordant voice will be heard in heaven for ever; nor could those who expect salvation, in any other way, join the praises of that blessed world, or even say, Amen, to them. As all the redeemed owe their felicity wholly to the sovereign mercy of the Father, through the atonement of the Son, and by the sealing and new creation of the Holy Spirit; so the work and worship of God their Saviour is their element, and his presence and favour complete their felicity; nor can they conceive of any other joy. Let us then inquire whether we have, in our judgment, experience, and affections, "the meetness for this inheritance of the saints in light." (Note, Col. 1:9—14.) All who are admitted to the marriage-supper of the Lamb, previously seek and obtain "the wedding garment:" none will ever join this company before the throne, who have not on earth learned to lisp their song, and to anticipate their felicity. If this be our privilege, let us bless God for his mercy, and patiently endure our season and measure of tribulation; expecting shortly "to hunger no more, and thirst no more;" to have no more sin, temptation,

CHAPTER VIII.

The seventh seal is opened; and, after a short silence, seven angels appear with seven trumpets prepared to announce approaching judgments; with reference to Christ's intercession and the prayers of his saints, 1—6. The sounding of four of the trumpets, with the emblematical predictions following each of them; and an intimation of more awful calamities, under the other three, 7—13.

[a] AND when he had opened the seventh seal, there was [b]silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.

2 And I saw the [c]seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven [d]trumpets.

3 And [e]another Angel came and [f]stood at the altar, [g]having a golden censer; and there was given unto him [h]much incense, that he should [i]offer it [h]with the prayers of all saints upon [k]the golden altar which was before the throne.

4 And [l]the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the Angel's hand.

5 And the Angel took the censer, [m]and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it [l]into the earth: [n]and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and [o]an earthquake.

or sorrow; to be with our beloved Saviour, enjoying the fulness of his love, drinking ineffable delights from "the living fountains of waters," to which he will lead us, and to have all tears for ever wiped from our eyes.—"I have waited for thy salvation, O LORD." (Notes, Gen. 49:18. Is. 12:1—3. Luke 2:25—32.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1—6. The last of the seven seals contains under it far more than all the others; as it introduces, and indeed included that period which fell under the seven trumpets. When this seal was opened, "there was silence in heaven for about half an hour;" which either intimated, that the peace of the church and of the empire would be of a very short continuance, or it was expressive of the solemn expectation excited on the occasion. During this interval, the apostle saw "the seven angels who stood before God," having been appointed to this service, of whom we shall read more afterwards: and "to each of them was given a trumpet," that they might in succession sound an alarm to the nations. (Marg. Ref. d.)—At the same time "another Angel" appeared as a Priest, standing before the altar of incense. The appearance of a Lamb was emblematical of "Christ our Passover, sacrificed for us;" and this Angel no doubt represented him in his priestly character, offering up the prayers of all his saints before God, accompanied by his all-prevailing intercession. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.) This being done, "the Angel filled the censer with fire from the altar." As there was no fire on the golden altar, except that in the censer, which was taken from the altar of burnt-offering; the fire, here spoken of, must have at first come from the altar of burnt-offering. This the Angel cast on the earth; "and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." This denoted, that the approaching calamities would be the effect of the displeasure of God with men, for their opposition to the gospel of his Son, and their injurious and cruel treatment of his people; and so in fact be inflicted, as an answer to their prayers for deliverance, through the intercession of Christ. (Notes, 6:9—11. 11:15—18.) After this, the seven angels prepared to sound the trumpets.—'The great Angel of the covenant ... came and stood, as the High-Priest of his church, before the altar of heaven; ... and many holy and effectual prayers were offered unto him, that he might by his merciful mediation present them to God the Father.' Bp. Hall.—'The placing of this circumstance immediately before the sounding of the trumpets, suggests, that the subject of these prayers was the occasion of something to be called for by these trumpets; and what could this be, but that of the destruction of the Roman empire? It is plainly suggested, that the petition for some delay would be accepted; yet all further applications on that head are discouraged by a most significant emblem, the censer being cast away.' Whitaker. (Notes, Ex. 27:1—8. 30:1—8. Lev. 10:1,2. 16:11—14.)

V. 7. The emblematical predictions following the four first trumpets, principally related to the gradual, but complete subversion of the Roman empire, in the western part of the world; though this was connected with multiplied calamities in the eastern provinces, which are also implied. Constantine the great built Constantinople, and made it his residence, and the metropolis of the empire; and, by a concurrence of circumstances some time after his death, that vast fabric, the Roman empire, was divided into two parts, governed by two distinct successions of emperors. But the western and eastern empires, when thus separated, were not wholly unconnected: so that the ruin of the western empire was attended by great convulsions in the eastern; and the subsequent subversion of the latter occasioned manifold evils in the countries which had constituted the former. As therefore the events, which related to the two divisions of the empire, were thus involved with one another, it was proper that the predictions of them should be so likewise: yet the residue of the chapter primarily predicts the subversion of the western, and the next chapter that of the eastern empire. (Notes, 9:)—The calm, which followed Constantine's accession to the throne, did not last long: even the latter part of his life was far from being undisturbed; and after his death many bloody wars were waged within the empire, by his sons with each other, and other competitors, for the imperial authority: whilst the church was disturbed by various descriptions of heretics; and unnatural persecutions were raised, by men who called themselves Christians. These and other evils weakened both the church and the state; and after a time, the Huns and Goths from the northern regions of Europe, broke in upon the distracted empire, and made terrible ravages in many of its provinces. The latter events seem to have been especially intended by the storm of "hail and fire mingled with blood," by which a third part of the productions of the earth were destroyed; that is, multitudes were killed, both high and low, grown persons and infants, through the whole Roman empire, which might be deemed a third part of the earth, as discovered at that time. (Ex. 9:22—25. Marg. Ref.)—This period is supposed by some approved expositors, to reach from A. D. 338 to 412: but others explain it principally of the incursions of the Goths under Alaric, who entered the empire A. D. 395; and after spreading desolation by fire and sword through the provinces, A. D. 410, took and plundered Rome, with circumstances of barbarity, very correspondent to these emblems, as contemporary writers have testified: especially in that he slew without distinction, princes, nobles, priests, and people, and showed no mercy even to the tender infants; thus destroying "the trees and the green grass," or smaller vegetable productions, indiscriminately.—'The first four trumpets describe the removal of that power; which in the days of Paul, ... prevented the developement of "the man of sin:" namely, the western imperial dignity of Rome.' Faber.—'On the decease of Theodosius, that great prince, A. D. 395, the northern cloud, which had been so long gathering, discharged itself.—He died in the month of January, and before the end of the same year, the Gothic nation was in arms.—The barriers of the Danube were thrown open; the savage warriors of Scythia issued from their forests; and the uncommon severity of the winter, (the season in which natural hail and snow are generated,) allowed the poet to remark, that they rolled their ponderous wagons over the broad and icy back of the indignant river. The fertile fields of Phocis and Beotia were covered with a deluge of barbarians, who massacred the males of an age to bear arms, and drove away the beautiful females, with the spoil and cattle of the flaming villages.' Gibbon.—'I have adopted the language of the historian. Unconscious, that he was bearing his testimony to the truth of prophecy, he has used the same allegorical language, as that employed by St. John. 'The correspondence of nations,' says he, 'was in that age so imperfect and precarious, that the revolutions of the north might escape the knowledge of the court of Ravenna; till the dark cloud, which was collected along the coasts of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon the banks of the upper Danube.'' Faber.—The nature of this publication must exclude most of the quotations, which might be made from Gibbon, the elegant and infidel historian of the decline of the Roman empire: but he has certainly, without intending it, shown the exact completion of these prophecies, in many instances.—Different opinions prevail, as to the duration of the events, predicted by the sounding of the first trumpet; but it cannot be expected, that these topics, which after all, very slightly affect the main subject, should be here particularly noticed. Some think, that all the calamities brought on the empire, by the northern invaders, and especially those of Attila, mentioned in the ensuing note, were intended by the general language of this verse, though other eminent expositors place a part of them under the second trumpet.

most celebrated poets. (Note, Jer. 51:25.) The Roman empire, with its vast multitude of people and nations, might be aptly compared to the sea. (17:15.) This "great mountain, burning with fire," therefore, being "cast into the sea," with the effects produced by it, represented most emphatically the irruption of the barbarous nations, under ferocious leaders, into the Roman empire, and their shedding of the blood of immense multitudes, and destroying the cities, or desolating the country with fire and sword. After Alaric, with his Goths, had finished his depredations; Attila, at the head of a vast army of Huns, ravaged the empire during the space of fourteen years, massacreing, plundering, and destroying all before him, in the most barbarous manner which can be conceived. He even called himself 'the scourge of God, and the terror of mankind:' and perhaps no man ever better merited that title. He was indeed a "burning mountain cast into the sea, and turning it into blood;" for he drenched the countries with the blood of the inhabitants, and destroyed every thing which came in his way; nor did any part of the empire wholly escape his fury. These events seem to have been principally intended; but we may include under this trumpet the various calamities, which befell the empire from A. D. 412 to 450.—If these devastations under Attila from the north, belong to the first trumpet; those under Genserick, king of the Vandals, from Africa, to the south, must be here intended. (Note, 10,11.)—But, whether Attila or Genserick were meant, it is manifest, that the "third part of the sea turned into blood," is the emblem of the Roman empire, opposed to contain a third part of the world; and the burning mountain must consequently mean the conqueror, who produced these effects, and not the conquered: else in the same verse there are two emblems of the latter, and none of the former. (Notes, 16:3—7 Ex. 7:15—21.)

V. 10, 11. The "great star falling from heaven," is explained by some expositors of the Arian and Pelagian heresies, and the contests and persecutions connected with them. And, no doubt, such events might very aptly be represented by "the falling of a star," and its imbittering and poisoning the waters, to the destruction of those who drank of them; the church also was miserably corrupted, and deformed by heresy, during that period. (Notes, Ex. 15:22—24. 2 Kings 2:19—22.)—Yet, the series of the prophecy favours the interpretation of those who explain these verses, to predict the continuation of those calamities, which subverted the empire. An eminent prince, suddenly appearing in the heart of the empire, and conspicuous even in the mischiefs which he occasioned, might be aptly represented by "a great star," or luminous meteor, shooting "from heaven, and burning as a lamp." The name "Wormwood," and the effect of its falling upon the waters, denote the further desolations of the empire, and the ruin of the remaining comforts, which were left to the relics of the miserable inhabitants; who were so harassed and afflicted, that they could not seek for the necessary support of life, without exposing themselves to the fury of the invaders. (Notes, Judg. 5:11. Lam. 5:8—10.) Thus the imbittering and poisoning of the rivers and fountains, completed the former judgment of turning the sea into blood.—Accordingly, very soon after Attila's retreat, Genserick unexpectedly invaded the empire with three hundred thousand Vandals and Moors from Africa; besieged and took Rome, and abandoned that city to the cruelty, avarice, and licentiousness of his troops; and by this success he so weakened the empire, that it was soon after subverted. As this assault was made at the very source of the Roman power and prosperity, it might on this account likewise be represented, as poisoning the rivers and fountains of waters.—Genserick was also a bigoted Arian, and a cruel persecutor of the orthodox Christians; and in this sense too he poisoned the fountains. These events occurred between A. D. 450 and 456.

V. 12. Under the fourth trumpet the sun, moon, and stars, or the great luminaries of the Roman empire, were eclipsed and darkened: (Notes, 6:12—14. Matt. 24:29—31.) for the third part, though spoken of the luminaries, or the time of their shining, seems still to refer to the extent of the empire, as containing one third of the then known world. While the splendour of the eastern empire was greatly tarnished, and it shone but with a feeble and almost expiring light; that of the western was gradually extinguished. 'Genserick left it in a weak and desperate condition: it struggled hard, and as it were gasped for breath, during eight short and turbulent reigns, for the space of twenty years, till at length it expired, A. D. 476, under Momyllus, who was in derision called Augustulus, or the diminutive Augustus.' Bp. Newton. Still, however, though the Roman sun was extinguished, its subordinate luminaries faintly shone, whilst the senate and consuls continued. But, after several other changes, at length, A. D. 566, the whole form of the ancient government was subverted, and Rome itself was reduced, from being the empress of the world, to be a poor dukedom tributary to the Exarch of Ravenna.—The events of above two hundred years are here predicted in six verses; events peculiarly important in themselves, and in their consequences, yet recorded by historians in the most disorderly and intricate manner. However therefore it may suit the design of those, who confine their labour to this one part of Scripture, to enter into particulars, or to argue either for or against any interpretation; it cannot fall in with the design of a practical exposition of the whole word of God. The author observes, with satisfaction, that the interpreters agree in the grand outline: and even the testimony of infidels, when writing the history of these times, demonstrates the exact accomplishment of the prophecy.—'I have now accomplished the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, from the fortunate age of Trajan and the Antonines, to its utter extinction in the west, about five centuries after the Christian era. At that unhappy period, the Saxons fiercely struggled with the natives for the possession of Britain; Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and the Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms of the Suevi and Burgundians: Africa was exposed to the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and to the savage insults of the Moors: Rome and Italy, as far as the banks of the Danube, were afflicted by an army of Barbarian mercenaries, whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the reign of Theodorick the Ostrogoth. All the subjects of the empire, who, by the use of the Latin language, more particularly deserved the name and privileges of Romans, were oppressed by the disgrace and calamities of foreign conquest; and the victorious nations of Germany established a new system of manners and government, in the western countries of Europe.' Gibbon. —Can there now be the shadow of a doubt, concerning the exact accomplishment of these compendious prophecies, some hundreds of years after they were written? And who can then hesitate to say, that St. John wrote by the inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning?

V. 13. This "angel flying through the midst of heaven," to denounce a wo thrice repeated, on the inhabitants of the earth, under the three remaining trumpets, was an emblem, intended to excite the strictest attention, and most awful expectation; and to intimate that evils still greater, more extensive, and durable, would come on mankind, in the subsequent ages; the events of which were about to be predicted. Hence they are generally called 'the three wo-trumpets: and this introduction should be kept in mind.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The intervals of peace, which the church has hitherto enjoyed, have commonly been of short continuance.—Amidst the confusion occasioned by the vices of mankind, we should rejoice that "the LORD reigneth:" and that the prayers of all true believers, being presented through the meritorious intercession of our great High-Priest, will surely be accepted and answered.—All created angels are "ministering spirits," for the benefit of "the heirs of salvation;" even when they are employed to visit nations with terrible calamities: nay, "the fire from the altar," being cast on the earth, (the vengeance inflicted for men's contempt of the sacrifice and salvation of Christ, and the injuries done to his people,) causes the most terrible desolations which occur in human affairs.—While the present wrath of God and of the Lamb, through those executioners of vengeance who mean not so, fills countries with misery, destroys the wretched inhabitants, and imbitters and poisons all the comforts of life, till the greatest prosperity is totally darkened and extinguished, and all ranks and orders of men involved in one common and dire calamity; the messengers of the Lord are ordered to proclaim aloud in all the world, that still more dreadful woes are in reserve for all the impenitent "workers of iniquity:" for what are all temporal evils compared with "the destruction of body and soul in hell?" Let sinners then take warning to "flee from the wrath to come:" let believers learn to value and to be thankful for their privileges; and let them "patiently continue in well-doing," and so "look for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. (Note, 8:10,11.) There can scarcely remain a doubt, in the mind of an attentive inquirer, who has competent information on the subject, that these verses predict the rise and progress of Mohammed and his successors, as ruling over the Arabians or Saracens. Early in the seventh century, (about A. D. 606—608,) Mohammed began to aver a very extraordinary intercourse with God: declaring that the angel Gabriel was frequently sent to him, to teach a religion, which he was to propagate in the world, being an improvement and a perfecting both of the religion of Moses and of Jesus, as at first delivered, and a reformation of them from subsequent perversions and corruptions. His fabled journey to heaven was announced some years after. He pretended, that he had been predicted in the books of Moses; but that the Jews had expunged these predictions. He also declared that Jesus had foretold his coming, under the name of Ahmed, which signifies very illustrious, and is nearly allied to Mohammed. (It is supposed that he mistook Παρακλητος, comforter, for περικλυτος, very illustrious.) These pretences are here, as it is generally agreed, described by "a star falling from the heaven to the earth;" and the emblem is the more appropriate, because he shone with a very conspicuous, though pestiferous light. The key given to him, to "open the bottomless pit," or the abyss of hell, was a very suitable emblem of the power and influence which God was pleased to permit him to acquire, for the propagation of his satanical delusions; as if hell itself had been opened by him, and its destructive exhalations allowed to obscure the sun and infect the air. (Note, 3:7.) For this most artful, politic, and prosperous impostor, gradually acquired such ascendency among the Arabians, or Saracens, to whom he belonged, that they not only received his religious system, but enlisted under his banner as their captain, and ruler; and he led them forth to conquest, that they might by this method compel others to receive his doctrine. In this enterprise, he and his successors were so prosperous, that the light of Christianity was obscured; and many nations, where once it had shone in the clearest manner, were almost totally darkened, and infected with this smoke from the abyss.—Mohammed had never been "a star," as that emblem marks out the ministers of Christianity; (Note, 1:12—20.) and he emerged from obscurity, acquired eminence and celebrity, and never declined from it. It has therefore been reasonably questioned, whether he could properly be denoted under the emblem of "a falling star;" or rather, according to the original, "a star which had fallen from heaven unto the earth." (Notes, 12:7—12. Luke 10:17—20.) An apostate Nestorian monk, called Sergius, or Baheira, has therefore been considered as this star; because he assisted Mohammed in forging his imposture, and was in many ways subservient to his designs. Thus he is supposed to have opened the abyss, and let forth the locusts and their king. (2,11.) But it may be doubted, whether so important a part, according to the general style and manner of prophecy, would be assigned to an individual comparatively obscure; of whose name few, except those who have very particularly studied Mohammed's history, have so much as heard. If "the fallen star" then means some agent distinct from Mohammed, who was his forerunner, as I conceive it does; I should fix upon the western corrupter of Christianity, whose "mystery of iniquity" had been long working, but burst forth almost at the same time with the imposture of Mohammed. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:3—7.) The worship of images, saints, and angels, prayers for the dead, and many other of the corruptions of popery, had at this time made very great progress in Christendom. These corruptions, of which the bishop and church of Rome were the source, centre, or principal support, evidently prepared the way for Mohammed, in connexion with the wickedness of the professors and ministers of Christianity; and furnished him with his most plausible pretexts; and so the "fallen star," the western antichrist, (if that name may for brevity's sake be used,) opened the door for Mohammed and his imposture, that is for the eastern antichrist. It appears clearly, that not an individual, no not Mohammed, as considered apart from the Caliphs his successors, is meant either by "the fallen star," or "the angel of the abyss;" but a succession of men, or associated bodies of men, carrying on from generation to generation the same design. And, as the corrupters of Christianity made way for the imposture of Mohammed, and the apostacy which it occasioned; who can more properly be designated by "the star fallen from heaven to earth," "and opening the abyss," than they? (See Faber Vol. II. 29—33.)—'The Christians of the seventh century relapsed into a semblance of Paganism: their public and private vows were addressed to the relics and images that disgraced the temples of the east. The throne of the Almighty was darkened by a crowd of martyrs and saints and angels, the objects of popular veneration: and the Collyridian heretics, who flourished in the fruitful soil of Arabia, invested the Virgin with the name and honours of a goddess.' Gibbon.

V. 3—5. "Out of the smoke" above mentioned "came locusts:" that is, great armies of Arabians, or Saracens were raised, by means of Mohammed's imposture, to spread desolations through the nations. (Notes, Ex. 10:6,13. Joel 1:4—7. 2:4,5,7—9,18—20.) They resembled locusts in their numbers: and they came from the same regions, whence the largest swarms of those destructive insects have in all ages arisen. Locusts are said to be bred in pits and caverns; and these proceeded from "the smoke, which came out of the bottomless pit." Yet, at the same time, they also resembled scorpions, the sting of which gives extreme pain, and often proves mortal. Thus, whilst locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, yet do not hurt the bodies of men: these mystical locusts were commanded not "to hurt the grass;" or other vegetable productions; but only "those men, who had not the seal of God upon their foreheads:" and it is remarkable, that the Saracen armies were expressly laid under a similar injunction.—'When Yezed was marching with his army to invade Syria, Abubeker charged him with this, among other orders, Destroy no palm trees, nor burn any fields of corn; cut down no fruit trees, nor do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat.' Bp. Newton Corrupt and hypocritical professors of Christianity were especially meant by "those men, who had not the seal of God in their foreheads;" which fully proves, that something wholly distinct from outward baptism, and exclusively belonging to true Christians, is denoted by that emblem. (Notes, 6:5,6. 7:1—3.)—Now, it is well known, that the Saracens extended their conquests principally in those countries, where the worship of saints and angels, and other corruptions of Christianity, prevailed; whilst the places, where religion was preserved more pure, were sheltered from their fury: and no doubt God permitted this scourge to come on the nations where his gospel was perverted, for their correction or punishment.—It was also predicted, that they would be restrained from killing those, whom they were commissioned to torment: but as immense multitudes were slain by these cruel victors, this cannot with propriety be interpreted literally; and it evidently means, that they would be empowered durably to ravage, harass, and disturb the nations and the church; but not utterly to destroy them.—'They might kill them as individuals; but still they should not kill them as a political body, as a state, or empire.' Bp. Newton.—Accordingly, they miserably desolated and oppressed, both the Greek and Latin churches, and the nations in which they were established, but they could not totally extirpate them: they repeatedly besieged Constantinople, but were always repulsed; they even plundered Rome, but they could not make themselves permanently masters of it; they took from the eastern empire many of its richest provinces, but they could not utterly subvert it.—Moreover, it was predicted, that they should distress and torment mankind, during "five months" according to the term of life, which naturalists assign to locusts. (10) These months consisting of thirty days, and each day denoting a year, amount to one hundred and fifty years: and Mohammed first began publicly to propagate his imposture, A. D. 612; and A. D. 762, (just one hundred and fifty years afterwards,) the city of Bagdad was builded, the Saracens ceased from their ravages, and became a settled people; they made no more rapid conquests, and obtained no further accession to their power, which thenceforth began to decline. V. 6. It was also foretold, that these tremendous conquerors would cause extreme calamities and miseries to the inhabitants of the countries which they ravaged, by giving the utmost license to the cruelty, rapacity, and lust of the soldiers. So that death would appear to vast numbers more desirable than life; and the conquerors would have been more merciful if they had despatched the wretched victims of their unbridled passions than by constraining them to drag on an unwilling life; and so prolonging those miseries, which they ardently wished for death to terminate. (Notes, 6:15—17. Deut. 28: 65—67. 1 Kings 19:3,4. Job 3:20—23. Jon. 4:9—11.)

V. 7—10. The shape of these figurative "locusts" was next described: they resembled horses; as indeed locusts do, especially in their heads. Now the Arabians were remarkable for their skill in horsemanship, and their chief force lay in cavalry. (Note, Joel 2:1—6.) The "crowns on their heads like gold," may denote the turbans, which the Arabians have always worn; or it may refer to the many kingdoms, which they subjected to their dominion. They had "faces, like men;" but they wore their hair like women, plaited, or flowing down their backs; and the Arabians are known to have done this. The "teeth, as of lions," which are ascribed to them, represented their strength and fury to destroy; whilst their "breastplates of iron" showed their care to protect themselves, by defensive armour, that is, by the most effectual public measures. The sound of their wings prefigured the fury with which they assaulted their enemies, and the rapidity of their conquests. But though they devoured and caused desolations, like locusts; yet the principal mischief which they did was effected by their tails, in which they had "stings like those of scorpions;" for wherever they extended their conquests, they left behind them the poison of their abominable religion: so that the consequences of their victories were far more mischievous than the slaughter made by them.

Stings. (10) Κεντρα. Acts 9:5. 26:14. 1 Cor. 15:55,56.

V. 11. The king over these locusts, who was "the angel of the abyss," or a messenger from the abyss, may signify their caliphs in succession, who were the chief priests of their religion, the commanders of their armies, and their emperors. The name of this king, even "the destroyer," (for so the word means in both languages,) was peculiarly suitable to a succession of rulers, who murdered both the bodies and souls of men, by the same malignant expeditions; as they seemed to be Satan the first murderer's vicegerents and visible representatives upon earth.—Every circumstance of this emblematical prediction so exactly accords to the Saracens, and so little suits the church or hierarchy of Rome, or any of their religious orders, (who gained their advantage by priestcraft, not by arms,) that there can be no propriety in attempting to explain it of them; especially as they are described with sufficient precision in what follows. Prophecies have a determinate meaning; and by giving loose to a lively imagination, to find distant resemblances, we are more like to perplex than to satisfy the inquirer.

V. 12. After the apostle had seen these things, he was informed, that "one wo was past, and two" others were coming.—'This is added, not only to distinguish the woes, and to mark more strongly each period; but also to suggest, that some time will elapse between this first wo of the Arabian locusts, and the next of the Euphratean horsemen.' Bp. Newton. (Note, 13—15.) It also serves to fix the order of time, in respect of the predicted events.

V. 13—15. The "voice from the horns of the altar," on which incense used to be burned, strongly indicated, that the judgments about to be predicted were appointed to punish men for corrupting the gospel, and so turning it into "the savour of death" and condemnation. (Notes, 8:1—6. 2 Cor. 2:14—17.)—After the sixth angel had sounded his trumpet, he was ordered to "loose the four angels, who had been bound near the Euphrates;" which was done accordingly. This is explained, by the most approved interpreters according to the emblematical style of the prophecy, to be a prediction, that the Turks, or Othmans, who had hitherto been restrained beyond the Euphrates, would be released from that restraint, and proceed to make conquests to the west of that river. The only material objection to this interpretation is drawn from the distance of time, which intervened between the events before predicted, and the victorious invasions of the Turks. But this is readily answered, by observing, that "the three wo-trumpets" must necessarily take in all the intervening time, between the subversion of the western empire, and the destruction of the beast, which is yet to be expected. (Note, 11:13,14.) The Saracens continued to possess, though they did not extend, their dominions, till the Turks supplanted them, and all this time properly belongs to the first wo-trumpet. Indeed no other events can be found in history, satisfactorily correspondent to the discoveries made after this second wo-trumpet; nor any other, which will not leave a far greater distance, between it and the third wo-trumpet, than this interpretation leaves between the first and the second. (Note, 11:15—18.)—The Turks pouring into Persia, and the regions bordering on the Euphrates, in the eleventh century, established four sultanies, or kingdoms in those parts: but they were prevented from making further conquests; especially by the Croisades, or religious wars, waged in that and the two following centuries, by the western Christians, who attempted to wrest Palestine out of the hands of the infidels. But when these ruinous projects were finally abandoned, the "four angels which had been bound in the Euphrates," who were emblems of these four sultanies, "were loosed." Then the Turks uniting together, began their ravages and victories; and made great havock among the inhabitants of that part of the world, which had constituted the Roman empire, and which we have often read of, as "the third part of men." (Note, 8:7.) The western empire had been broken to pieces under the four first trumpets; (Notes, 8:) the eastern had been nearly ruined under the fifth; and under the sixth it was finally subverted. The Turks conquered all the countries which had belonged to it. A. D. 1453, they took Constantinople, and thus brought to an end the whole imperial power, which originally belonged to Rome.—These powers were prepared for a certain fixed time, which being computed by a year for each day, according to the prophetic manner, and twelve months for thirty days each being allowed to the year here mentioned, that is 360 days, or years; thirty more being added for the month, and one for the day; the whole amounts to 391 years and fifteen days. Now the first conquest of the Turks over the Christians took place A. D. 1281: and the last success, by which they extended their dominions, was A. D. 1672: being exactly 391 years from the one to the other. So that one of their historians (Prince Cantemir) here divides his narrative, calling the former part 'The growth of the Othman empire,' the latter, 'The decay of the Othman empire.' Since that period, they have had little success in any of their wars; and their power is so much weakened and straitened at present, by the rival power of Russia, that it is not at all probable they will ever recover their ascendency, or renew their conquests. Had we records of these events sufficiently exact, we should no doubt find, that the half hour, or fifteen days, was fixed with the same punctuality by the Spirit of prophecy.—Though the term of their "slaying the third part of men," or that during which they would extend their ravages and conquest, was predicted; yet that of the duration of their empire was not: but it will end after the sounding of the third wo-trumpet. (11:14.) Dr. Lloyd, ... bishop of Worcester, who has now, for above twenty years been studying the Revelations, with an amazing diligence and exactness, had long before this year said The peace, between the Turks and the papal Christians, was certainly to be made in the year 1698, which he made out thus; the four angels, mentioned in ... Revelation, that were bound in the river Euphrates, which he expounds to be the captains of the Turkish forces, that till then were subject to the sultan at Babylon, were to be loosed, and freed from that yoke, and set up for themselves. And these were prepared to slay the third part of men, for an hour, a day, a month, and a year. He reckons the year in St. John, as the Julian year of three hundred and sixty-five days; a month is thirty of these days, and a day makes one: which added to the former number makes three hundred and ninety-six. Now he proves from historians, that Ottoman came, and began his conquests at Prousse, in the year 1302; to which the former number, in which they were to slay the third part of men being added, it must end in the year 1698. And though the historians do not mark the hour, or the twelfth part of the day, or year; yet he is confident, if that ever is known, that the prophecy will be found, in that, to be punctually accomplished. After this, he thinks, their time of hurting the papal Christians is at an end. They may indeed still do mischief to the Muscovites, or persecute their own Christian subjects, but they can do no more hurt to the papalians.' Bp. Burnet's History of his own Time.—In several subordinate particulars this statement differs from that above given; which seems to be the more exact, both as to the beginning of the Othman's successes, and the close of them; and also of the method by which the time should be computed. Yet the grand outline of interpretation is the same: and considering the date of Bishop Lloyd's conclusions, which preceded the final successes of the Othmans, but which have, for substance, been verified for much above a hundred years, they may justly be considered as extraordinary; and as an important proof of the true meaning of the prophecy and of its exact accomplishment. (Note, 16:12—16.)

V. 16. The number of the army of horsemen was declared to be "two hundred millions;" (δυο μυριαδες μυριαδων, twice ten thousand times ten thousand;) that is, an immense multitude, a very large definite number being put for an indefinite. (Note, 5:11—14.) Accordingly the Turks brought vast armies into the field, often to the amount of four, five, six, or seven hundred thousand men, chiefly cavalry: and when the whole multitude of those is considered, who were employed in this manner during the conquests of 391 years, we shall see the propriety of the apostle's strong prophetical language.

V. 17—19. The apostle likewise saw both "the horses and their riders," in his vision, as having "breastplates of fire, hyacinth, and brimstone;" which may be considered as representing the scarlet, blue, and yellow colours, for which they have always been remarkable. The horses' heads, like those of lions, denoted their strength, courage and fierceness: and "the fire, smoke, and brimstone, which issued out of their mouths, and killed the third part of men," appears to me an evident and most astonishing prediction of the use of gunpowder and of artillery, which were first invented about this period, and which the Turks employed with great success in their wars, especially in the siege of Constantinople; when immensely large guns were used, so that one of them is said to have carried a stone of three hundred pounds weight. By these the walls of that city were at length battered down, which made way for the final destruction of that empire. —These tremendous conquerors, before whom desolation marched, and from whose mouths "fire, and smoke, and brimstone issued," not only slew men in battle when they faced them; but they had tails like serpents, with heads upon them, with which they hurt men, as by an envenomed bite. That is, the Othmans or Turks left behind them, wherever they went, the same poisonous and ruinous religion, which the Saracens had done before them; and this proved more lurably mischievous than their most bloody conquests. So that the remains of the Greek church, and of Christianity in those countries were almost wholly extirpated; and Mohammedism became universally prevalent, and indeed continues so to this day, in that part of the world, in which the gospel had been for a long time most signally successful. Tails. (19) Note, 7—10, v. 10.

V. 20, 21. "The rest of the men," who were not destroyed, or compelled to become Mohammedans, by the abovementioned calamities, did not repent of their evil works. The Latin or Roman church, which escaped this destruction, still persisted in the idolatrous worship of demons, or angels and departed saints, real or fictitious, by which devils are virtually worshipped; (Notes, Dan. 11:38. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) in their stupid adoration of senseless images, for which they have no better plea to use than the Pagans had; in their "murders," massacres, and bloody wars with heretics, so called, and their execrable persecutions: in their "sorceries," or pretended revelations and miracles: and in "their fornication;" forbidding marriage, yet conniving at concubinage in the clergy binding numbers by vows to a single life, and yet licensing brothels by public authority of the Pope, in Rome itself: and in "their thefts," or those exactions and impositions, by which they fraudulently, oppressively, and iniquitously drew immense treasures from the nations. (Notes, 13:11—17. 16:10, 11. 17:1—6.) The eastern church, in which many corruptions first prevailed, was punished by the first wo of the Saracens; and as this did not bring them to repentence, the second wo of the Turks or Othmans completed its ruin. But the western church, not repenting of her abominations, will at length be overwhelmed with the third wo. For the reformation from popery, and all that has hitherto taken place in these western regions, has amounted only to the "two witnesses," (Note, 11:3—6.) protesting against the prevailing abominations: and the prevalence of infidelity, skepticism, and heresy, in proportion to the supposed decline of popery and superstition, gives no just room to suppose, that matters are very much improved in the western church. In this skeptical, profane, licentious, and superficial age, indeed, Satan has evidently changed his ground; but the scriptural Christian will readily perceive, that he has hitherto in great measure maintained it. —The persevering idolatry in the remains of the Greek church and elsewhere, and the iniquity of professed Christians, notwithstanding the desolations made among them by the Saracens and Turks, renders the prophecy more circumstantial, and the exact accomplishment of it more wonderful. The very things which infidels urge, as objections to the divine original of Christianity, are expressly predicted in the New Testament, and demonstrate its divine inspiration.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The Lord frequently sees good to punish the abuse of spiritual advantages, by spiritual judgments; leaving "the sun, and the air, to be darkened with the smoke of the infernal pit," and the word of the gospel to be withdrawn or corrupted, by the artifices of Satan; because men would not walk in the light, while they enjoyed it. "A fallen star," some apostate endued with abilities and possessed of influence, often proves Satan's instrument in blinding and deceiving mankind. This judgment, however, would for the present be little regarded, if other visitations were not connected with it: but, sooner or later, devouring locusts and tormenting scorpions will come out of the baleful smoke; and the prevalence of false religion against the truth of Christ will make way for such calamities on guilty nations, as may render life itself a burden, and death the only apparent and desired relief.—In the future world, all the wicked will be tormented, but not killed: they will desire in vain to sink into nonexistence: in this sense "death shall flee from them," and they shall never overtake it. As we ought to "fear him, who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell," far more "than them that can only kill the body;" so those destroyers are most to be dreaded, who act as "angels of the bottomless pit," and vicegerents of Satan, by diffusing pernicious heresies and impostures, contrary to the pure doctrine of Christ. For that grand deceiver, which, "transformed into an angel of light," and his ministers when they appear to be teachers of righteousness, do far more mischief to mankind, than the most barbarous and successful warriors could ever accomplish: but he who murders at once both the souls and bodies of men, most completely merits the title of Abaddon, Apollyon, the Destroyer.

V. 12—21. We may rejoice, that the Lord has "a hook in the nose, and a bridle in the mouth" of every boasting enemy, by whatever method he threatens to subvert his cause. He gives deceivers or destroyers power, till his own purposes of judgment or correction are accomplished; and then he cuts them off, or lays them aside, at his pleasure. Thus one wo

CHAPTER X.

The apostle in vision beholds a mighty Angel, with a little book open in his hand; and hears the voice of seven thunders, which he was ordered to seal up, 1—4. comes after another, on hypocrites and corrupt churches; but they "who have the seal of God in their foreheads," cannot be hurt: for the Lord binds and looses, limits or enlarges, increases or diminishes nations and their rulers, "according to the counsel of his own will." The attentive reader of Scripture and of history may therefore find his faith and hope increased by those events, which in other respects fill his heart with horror and anguish, and suffuse his cheeks with floods of tears: while he contemplates men's ingenuity and indefatigable industry in the work of destruction, and in extending misery among their fellow-creatures; and while he observes, that the rest of men, who escape these plagues, repent not of their evil works, but go on with their idolatries, impiety, infidelity, iniquity, oppression, cruelty, and licentiousness, "till wrath come upon them also to the uttermost."

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1. In the conclusion of the former chapter, the apostle had received some intimations concerning the pertinacious corruptions of the western church, and other professed Christians, during the period of the two preceding trumpets: but before he was made acquainted with the events which would follow the sounding of the seventh trumpet, he was shown something more of the state of that church, in the ages previous to this grand event. This information was introduced by a most august and consolatory vision. Being, in his own apprehension, on earth, he saw another "mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud" to veil the splendour of his appearance, and as an emblem of the darkness of the dispensations which were predicted; "a rainbow," signifying "the covenant of grace," surrounded his head; his "face shone like the sun, and his legs were as pillars of fire." (Notes, 1:12—20. 4:1—3.) This mighty angel must be either Christ himself, or an emblematical display of his glory.

V. 2—4. The angel, thus introduced, held in his hand "a little book" as containing the Revelation of the purposes of God, which he was about to communicate to his servant. This was distinct from the larger book before mentioned, being a kind of appendix or codicil to it. (Note, 5:1—4.) Or it might be one of the seven parts of that book, which as some think, might each be called a "a little book." It had been sealed, but appeared as having been opened: and contained a part of "the book before spoken of," though thus introduced separately, to call and fix the attention. At least it perfectly coincided with the contents of it. Several respectable interpreters suppose this little book to have contained all the following parts of "the Revelation;" and thus they make it much greater than all the rest of the book, of which Christ opened the seals: containing (as some of them suppose) all which should take place after the sounding of the seventh trumpet: whereas the former part of the next chapter, and all the two following chapters at least, belong to the sixth trumpet. These are objections against that arrangement, to which I could never find a satisfactory answer: besides, the great book would end abruptly in the middle of the sixth trumpet; and the same subject would be as abruptly taken up in "the little book." It therefore appears to me, that this little book contained no more than the former part of the next chapter; (Notes, 11:1—14.) which was an important appendix to the ninth chapter, as it gives a general account of the state of the western church, and all connected with it, during the period of the fifth and sixth trumpets. Then the former subject proceeds, the seventh trumpet is sounded, and a compendious view is given of the subsequent events to the end of the world. (Note, 11:15—18.) After this the second part of the book is introduced; (Note, 11:19.) and the apostle is shown a great variety of events, tending to explain those, which had before been predicted, in a more summary manner; but chiefly relative to the state of the church, as the former part had been to those which concerned the empire. This arrangement, which is nearly the same with that adopted by Bishop Newton, makes no material alteration in the plan of the celebrated Mr. Mede, and those who have followed him; while it avoids the difficulty of making the little book by far the largest, and the necessity of dividing the sixth trumpet between the two books. Still every event is referred to the times, to which, according to the synchronisms of that able and laborious writer, it belongs, and which are evidently deduced, not from vague hypotheses, but from the internal construction of the prophecy itself. And the observation of another learned writer, Bp. Hurd, stands equally good: 'The knowledge of this order is a great restraint on the fancy of an expositor, who is not now at liberty to apply the prophecies to events of any time to which they may appear to suit; but to events only falling within that time, to which they belong, in the course of this predetermined method: and if to this restriction we add another, which arises from the necessity of applying not one, but many prophecies, to the same time; we can hardly conceive how an interpretation should keep clear of all these impediments, and make its way through so many interfering checks, unless it were the true one. Just as when a lock (to use Mr. Mede's allusion) is composed of many intricate wards; the key, that easily turns within them, and opens the lock, can only be that which properly belongs to it.'—Since I first wrote these remarks, expositors have arisen, (especially the pious and learned Mr. Faber,) who suppose, that the little book contained the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters of Revelation. But, after very much consideration, I feel constrained to dissent from this opinion, however respectably supported. First, because it makes the little book, or codicil, bear a too great proportion to the whole prophecy. The prophetical chapters, properly speaking, are only twelve; namely, the sixth, eighth, ninth, eleventh, to the fourteenth inclusive, and the sixteenth to the twentieth inclusive: for the seventh, tenth, and fifteenth contain not much explicit prediction; and the two last chapters, succeeding, as it appears to me, the day of judgment, are rather descriptive of the heavenly state, than prophetical, in the ordinary sense of the word. Now the four chapters, assigned to the little book, not being very short, yet crowded with most important predictions, contain at least a third of the whole prophecy; which is more than can properly be assigned to "the little book." Secondly, the eleventh chapter evidently carries on the prediction, in a general manner, to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Note, 11. 15—18.) Now, the succeeding chapters to the twentieth, plainly treat of times previous to the Millennium. The prophet must, therefore, somewhere go back to take a more particular view of his subject, than he at first gave: but no place can be assigned for this, so satisfactorily, as the close of the eleventh chapter. The course of predicted events cannot be successive, in those chapters; therefore some of them must be coincident. Thirdly, no interpretation of the former verses of the twelfth chapter, gives the least satisfaction, except that which recalls the reader's attention to the events, which took place when pagan persecution terminated the Roman emperor's professed Christianity; and further corruptions, calamities, and persecutions, sprang from that very source, which seemed to promise far happier days. I therefore am most decidedly of opinion, that "the little book" contains only the first fourteen verses of the next chapter, to the close of the sixth trumpet; being coincident, as to the state of things in the west, with that of the eastern empire, as predicted in the ninth chapter. I am not, however, unwilling to concede, that the following verses, to the close of the eighteenth, may be assigned to it, as a general pre-intimation of the final success of that cause, which had so long been trampled under foot. Several objections to this interpretation will be obviated as we proceed.—The mighty Angel above described, "set his right foot on the sea, and his left on the dry land," to denote his sovereign authority over the whole terraqueous globe; and perhaps intimating his determination of spreading the gospel through every part of it: and he demanded attention, with a loud voice, like the roaring of a lion; to show the power and terror of his word to his obstinate enemies. After this seven thunders were heard, which in the most majestic manner uttered intelligible voices: these either related to matters

8 And [u]the voice which I heard from heaven spake unto me again, and said, Go, and take the little book which is open in the hand of the Angel which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth.

9 And I went unto the Angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, [v]Take it, and eat it up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey.

10 And I took the little book out of the Angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth [x]sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it [y]my belly was bitter.

11 And he said unto me, [z]Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle is directed to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers; but to leave "the outer court to the Gentiles;" with a prediction of their prevalence for forty-two months, 1, 2. Power is given to two witnesses, who prophesy in sackcloth, during twelve hundred and sixty days, 3—6. The beast makes war upon them, and slays them: but after three days and a half, they arise, and ascend into heaven, 7—12. Divine judgments overtake their enemies, 13, 14. The seventh trumpet sounds; and a discovery is made of the glorious events which shall follow, 15—18. An introduction to the prophecies of the subsequent chapter, 19.

AND there was given me [a]a reed like unto a rod: [b]and the Angel stood, saying, Rise, and [c]measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein.

2 But [d]the court which is without the temple, [e]leave out, and measure it not; for [e]it is given unto the Gentiles: [f]and the holy city shall they [g]tread under foot [h]forty and two months.

proper for the apostle to know, but not proper to be published; or else they are coincident with some things, which are afterwards more clearly revealed. They were, however, ordered to be sealed up, and it does not become us to inquire any further concerning them.

V. 5—7. The apostle next saw the mighty Angel "lift up his hand to heaven," as it was customary to do when solemn oaths were taken; (Notes, Deut. 32:40—42. Dan. 12:5—9.) and heard him swear by the self-existent, eternal Creator of all things, (Note, 4:9—11. Marg. Ref. o, p.) "that there should be time no longer:" or as it may be rendered, that "the time should not be yet:" that is, the time of those glorious things, with which "the mystery of God would be finished." Further delays must be expected: till at length, in "the days of the seventh angel," after he had begun to sound his trumpet, that would be accomplished, according to the predictions of former prophets; namely, as it may be supposed from the subsequent part of the book, in the destruction of every opposing power, and the universal prevalence of true religion; which would continue, with little interruption, to the consummation of all things, and so terminate in the eternal state. (Notes, 11:15—18. 18:—20:) But before those events began to take place, other preparatory transactions must occur; and this solemn declaration seems to have been intended to teach Christians, in the intervening ages, to wait with patience, and to expect a happy event of the calamities of the church, though the time of it seemed long delayed. (Notes, Dan. 7:9—14,23—27. 8:13,14. 12:5—13.)—If we adhere to our translation, the meaning must be, that all the subsequent events, to the end of time, would fall under the period of the seventh trumpet.—Liveth, &c. (6) 1:18.

Declared. (7) Ευηγγελισε. Proclaimed the gospel, referring to the glad tidings of the Millennium.

V. 8—11. (Notes, Ez. 3:1—3,12—15.) The apostle's 'eating the book," was an emblem of his duly considering and understanding it; and thus making it his own, as it were, to the purposes for which he received it. The knowledge of future events was at first very sweet to him, as honey to the taste; (Notes, 5:1—4. Jer. 15:16—18.) but when he had more fully understood them, they occasioned him inward grief and anguish of heart. By publishing the contents of this little book, and the rest of the predictions, which he was about to receive, he has indeed "prophesied before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings," and does so to this very day, in all the languages into which the Scriptures have been or shall be translated; and in all the countries in which they are circulated.

Make bitter. (9) Πικρανει. 8:11. Col. 3:19. It is used figuratively for whatever excites uneasy and painful sensations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The divine Surety of the new covenant, who "purchased the church with his own blood," manages all things in heaven and earth with uncontrollable authority. His power and his word are most terrible to his enemies; but the believer can have no reason to fear his unchangeable Friend; for he will communicate those discoveries and consolations to him, which are kept secret from all others. (Notes, Ps. 25:14. John 15:12—16.)—The final salvation of the righteous, and the final prevalence of true religion on earth, are engaged for by the same unfailing word of the Lord: and, though "the time shall not be yet," we have solid ground to conclude, that "the sounding of the seventh trumpet" is near at hand, when glorious scenes will be exhibited. Very soon, however, to us, "time shall be no more:" but if we are believers, a happy eternity will follow; and we shall look down from heaven, to behold and rejoice in the triumphs of Christ, and his cause on earth. Let us then rely on the unchangeable word and oath of the Lord, for strong consolation amidst all our trials; let us at end to and obey the voice from heaven, which calls us from the attractions of things present, that we may consider "the things which shall be hereafter." Let us seek our instructions from Christ, and obey his orders; daily meditating on his word, and so digesting it, and turning it into nourishment to our own souls; and then declaring it to those around us, according to the duties of our several stations. Indeed the sweetness of such contemplations will often be mingled or followed with bitterness; while we compare the Scriptures with the state of the world, and the church, or even with that of our own hearts. Yet, if we have scriptural ground to conclude, that we are interested in the salvation of Christ and if we be employed in any measure for the good of others, we should not so much regard our present feelings, as the glory of God in our eternal happiness, in that of those with whom we are connected, and in the salvation of sinners in all the regions of the whole earth.

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. It has before been supposed, that the former part of this chapter exhibits the contents of the little book; (Notes, 10:2—4.) which represents the state of the western church, during the two preceding wo-trumpets, and before the sounding of the seventh trumpet; (15) and this fixes the chronology of it.—The discoveries of this little book are related under emblematical appearances and actions, as before. The scene is the temple; and "a reed," like a "measuring rod," being given to the apostle, he was ordered to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers in the inner court. (Notes, Ex. 27:9—19. Ez. 40:3.) This denoted that, in the predicted period, there would be a small number, whose doctrine, worship, and behaviour, would bear measuring by the word of God; and that these only would be acceptable interior worshippers: whereas "the outer court," being left by express command unmeasured, and "given unto the Gentiles," emphatically showed, that the greatest number of professed Christians would be formal, superstitious, and idolatrous worshippers; Christians only in name, but Gentiles in wickedness, and even in idolatry. The "holy city" also, being "trodden under foot" by them, implied that the church at large, and its most lucrative and eminent places, would be filled with idolaters, infidels, and hypocrites, and that true Christians would be oppressed in a grievous manner. The duration of these evil times was fixed to forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty days, which by prophetical computation are so many years. (Notes, Dan. 7:23—27. 8:9—14. 12:5—13.) The whole of Daniel's prophecies should be compared with the subsequent parts of this book, as the same events and dates are intended in both; and this gives a measure of certainty to the interpretation. Daniel also fixes these events to the remains of the fourth monarchy, after it was broken to pieces, and formed ten kingdoms; and this determines the geography of them, especially to the western empire, which was properly the seat of that monarchy. So that the outlines, both of the time and place, to which these prophecies belonged, are unalterably determined by the prophets themselves: nor can the accomplishment of them be referred to any other times or places, without doing the most manifest violence to them in both respects. Indeed the prophecies of Daniel, and those of the apostle, when properly explained, and compared with each other and with their accomplishment, constitute the fullest imaginable demonstration of the truth of the Scripture. But demonstration itself cannot convince those who will not bestow due pains to examine it.—The beginning of these twelve hundred and sixty years must be placed subsequent to the first four trumpets, on the subversion of the western empire, which was completed A. D. 566. This made way for the pope, in process of time, to acquire a vast accession of ecclesiastical dominion. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3—7.) He became universal bishop, A. D. 606; and was fully established as a temporal prince, A. D. 756. Did we know exactly at what time to date the beginning of the twelve hundred and sixty years, we might show with certainty when they would terminate: but this would not consist with that wise obscurity, which always in some respects rests on prophecies, before they are fulfilled. I'll the event there fore, shall explain this matter, it must be left undetermined: but perhaps the beginning of the rise and of the fall of this antichristian tyranny, and the completion of them, may both be at the distance of twelve hundred and sixty years from each other; as in more than one way the Babylonish captivity lasted seventy years. (Notes, 2 Kings 24:1,8—16. Ezra 1:1—4. Dan. 1:1,2.) The beginning however of these years cannot well be fixed sooner than A. D. 606, nor later than A. D. 756. It is, indeed, far from probable, that the beginning fell so late as this; but that it did not much precede 606, will, I think, afterwards appear. (Note, 7—12.)—' Measuring the servants of God is equivalent to sealing them.—The unmeasured tenants of the outer court, and the unsealed men throughout the Roman empire, are alike the votaries of the apostacy: while they that were measured, and they that were sealed, are the saints who refused to be partakers of his abominations.' Faber.

V. 3—6. It would be tedious even to mention the conjectural explications, which have been given of this prophecy concerning the witnesses: but they generally and notoriously violate the apostle's rule; (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.) not proceeding upon a large and comprehensive view of the subject, but confining the interpretation to private and comparatively little events. A "king," in prophetical language, commonly means a succession of monarchs: a "witness," therefore must be explained by the same rule; and not individuals, but a succession of men, who, during the period referred to, bore testimony to the truth, must be intended by the prophecy. "Two witnesses" were mentioned, because one was insufficient for the legal proof of any fact. (Notes, Deut. 17:2—7, v. 6. 19:15—21, v. 15.) For these "witnesses" would be as few, as could suffice to attest the true gospel, and to enter a public protest against the antichristian perversions of it; perhaps Moses and Aaron, Elijah and Elisha, and the apostles and seventy disciples, sent forth "two and two," might be alluded to. All real Christians, who boldly professed their religion, may be considered as uniting in this testimony: yet ministers, and especially bold and zealous men, who attempted reformation, were "the witnesses" primarily intended. The Angel before mentioned, (1) even the Lord Jesus, declared that he would "give them power," or authority, "to prophesy," during the assigned time; yet "in sackcloth," as expressive of their afflicted, persecuted state, and of their deep concern and sorrow of heart, on account of the abominations against which they protested.—It has been shown by many writers, that during the darkest ages of popery, men were raised up, who bore a decided testimony against the prevailing corruptions of the Roman church, and for the leading doctrines of the gospel. It was indeed the interest and the constant practice of their opponents, to silence their testimony, to blacken their characters, or to destroy them as heretics: yet, after all their endeavours to suppress, misrepresent, and mutilate their writings; enough remains to show, that Christ had a remnant of faithful witnesses and disciples, through all the ages intended even to this day. From the eighth to the eleventh century inclusive, we find accounts of individuals, or collective bodies, who under the brand of heresy, and in the face of persecution, evidently held, and openly professed, the great doctrines of salvation by faith in Christ, and through his mediation, merits, and grace; and protested against the abuses of popery: and these, who just prevented the total darkness of that gloomy period, could by no means be extirpated. On the contrary, they continued to increase in many places: in the valleys of Piedmont especially, vast multitudes were collected, and called Waldenses and Albigenses, who were evidently Calvinists, (to speak in modern language,) more or less moderate, and consistent in their views; and their lives were generally exemplary, as some of the Papists themselves have allowed. These subsisted during the twelfth, thirteenth, and following centuries; though they were persecuted with such unrelenting fury, and pursued with such cruel and destructive wars, that in France alone, a million of them are computed to have been slain for the sole crime of protesting against the tyranny of the Pope, and the corruptions of the church of Rome! They, however, continued to "prophesy in sackcloth;" and when driven from Piedmont, they settled in other places, propagated their religion, and prepared the way for the Reformation. Connected with them, and agreed in their leading doctrines, and in opposition to the church of Rome, were the Lollards in England; and the Bohemians, from among whom arose John Huss and Jerom of Prague, who were burnt in the fifteenth century by the council of Constance. Multitudes embraced the doctrines of the gospel in different places, during those times, and professed or preached it at the hazard of their lives; and great numbers were burnt or put to death in the most cruel manner, for so doing.—'The visible assemblies of the Paulicians, or Albigeois were extirpated by fire and sword; and the bleeding remnant escaped by flight, concealment, or catholic conformity. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world.—In the state, in the church, and even in the cloister, a latent succession was preserved of the disciples of St. Paul, who protested against the tyranny of Rome, embraced the Bible as the rule of faith, and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology. The struggles of Wickliff in England, and of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual: but the names of Zuinglius, Luther, and Calvin, are pronounced with gratitude as the deliverers of nations!' Gibbon.—'How striking a testimony is here given, by an enemy of Christianity, to the fulfilment of prophecy! Gibbon writing an involuntary comment on St. John!' Cunninghame. At length Luther arose, and the reformation took place; since which time, the same testimony for the truth of Christ, and against the errors of Antichrist, has been maintained. Nor does it appear, that the term is yet expired; for "they shall prophesy 1260 days clothed in sackcloth." The term of their "prophesying in sackcloth," before they "are slain and rise again," (Note, 7—12.) must extend through the whole of the forty and two months, and cannot terminate till these are ended. This is wonderfully overlooked by many expositors, who inconsistently suppose the witnesses to have finished their "testimony in sackcloth," and having been slain, to have risen again; at a time, when, by their own computation, the 1260 years were not closed. The witnesses are not indeed at present exposed to such terrible sufferings, as in former times: but those scenes may be reacted before long for what any man can foreknow; and they have abundant cause "to prophesy in sackcloth," on account of the declined state of religion even in the protestant churches.—However, though men despised and hated the witnesses, they were in reality "the two olive-trees," endued with spiritual gifts and grace, that through their instrumentality, others also might receive "the unction from the Holy One;" and "the two candlesticks," to hold forth the light of divine truth in this benighted world: they stood to minister with acceptance, "before the God of the earth," the Proprietor and Governor of all mankind; and were the champions, as it were, of his cause, and the heralds of his glory, in the countries where they lived. (Notes, 1 12—20. Zech. 4:2,3,11—14.) Moreover, if any man, being enraged by their testimony, and emboldened by their apparent weakness, should attempt to injure them; "fire proceedeth from their mouths, and devoureth their enemies," who would in this manner be slain: that is, the Lord would certainly plead and avenge their cause, and resent the injuries done to them, as done against himself. (Notes, Zech. 2:6—9. Acts 9:3—6.) Their warnings and instructions would tend to the condemnation of those who hated them on that account: the denunciations of divine vengeance, uttered by them, would infallibly be accomplished; and even their prayers would be answered in judgments on those who persisted in their enmity. For, in this respect, they would have power, like Elijah, "to shut heaven, and to restrain the rain from falling," during "the three years and a half" of their prophesying; (Notes, 1 Kings 17:1. Jam. 5:16—18.) or to prevent blessings coming from above on those who rejected their testimony and persecuted them for it: as well as to "turn the waters into blood," or to inflict all other plagues at their pleasure, as Moses did upon the Egyptians. (Notes, Ex. 7:15—25.) That is, they would have as great an interest in heaven, as the most eminent of the prophets; and God would as surely punish those nations, princes, or persons, who injured them, as he did those who had formerly oppressed his people, or murdered his messengers.

V. 7—12. When these witnesses "shall have finished," or "shall be about to finish," their testimony; "the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit," (that is, the persecuting power, which will afterwards be more fully described, Notes, 13:1—7. 17:7,8.) shall fight against them, and "kill them." Many private interpretations (for so they appear to me) have been given of this passage, as if it related to the martyrdom of individuals, or partial persecutions, a pas-of [z]the great city, which spiritually is called [a]Sodom and [b]Egypt, where also [c]our Lord was crucified.

9 And they of [d]the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations, shall see their dead bodies [e]three days and a half, [f]and shall not suffer their [g]dead bodies to be put in graves.

10 And they that [g]dwell upon the earth shall [h]rejoice over them, and [i]make merry, and shall send gifts one to another; because [k]these two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth.

11 And after [l]three days and a half [m]the Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; [n]and great fear fell upon them which saw them.

12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them, [o]Come up hither. [p]And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; [q]and their enemies beheld them.

times; and some strangely imagine, that it only denotes the constant persecution of true Christians, through the whole period of twelve hundred and sixty years: I cannot, however, but think, that it relates to events yet future; and the fulfilment of it must be nearly at the same time, as the sounding of the seventh trumpet.—"The great city," in the street of which the dead bodies of the witnesses shall lie unburied, does not seem to mean either Rome or Jerusalem literally; but Jerusalem mystically; that is, the professing church of God, as possessed by Gentiles; (2) and so become the rival of "Sodom" in lewdness; of "Egypt" in cruelty to the children of God; and of "Jerusalem" at the time when Christ was there crucified, in general enmity to him and his cause. Yet the arrangement of the prophecy in other respects shows, that the countries, which belonged to the church of Rome, when at the height of its power, and most prosperous in its rage, "for crucifying our Lord afresh" in his people, were principally intended: and indeed it is worthy of notice, that though our Lord personally was crucified at Jerusalem, it was by the authority of the Roman emperor, when Judea was a province of that empire. Present appearances, indeed, in some degree may seem to favour the opinion, that this general and successful war of the beast against the witnesses of Christ, will be conducted under another form, and other pretences, and perhaps by other instruments and means, than former assaults have been. Papal persecutors were often concealed infidels; and infidels concealed under another mask, and so opposing vital Christianity within the same district, may perhaps equally answer to the prediction: for the peculiar opinions of this antichristian power are not here specified, and the apostle elsewhere speaks of antichrist as one, who opposes the doctrine, the authority, or glory of Christ, (Notes, 1 John 2:18—25. 4:1—3.) The prevalence of infidelity in different forms, throughout Europe, and the zeal, with which principles of that tendency are every where propagated, when contrasted with the declining state of Popish superstition, renders it not wholly improbable, that "the beast" may change his ground and method of attack, before he thus prevails against the witnesses; for that time approaches: though popery itself is far more deeply rooted in a vast proportion of professed Christians, than is generally supposed; and seems at present (1815) greatly prevailing against open infidelity, nay, I fear nominal protestantism.—It likewise appears from the prediction, that the temporary victory of this enemy over the truth will be so entire, throughout the extent of the western church, that there will be scarcely any open profession or preaching of the true gospel, or steady opposition to the prevailing antichristianity, in all that part of the world: so that the different nations of Europe, and others as connected with them, will have nothing to do, but to contemplate and insult "over the dead bodies of the witnesses," which they will not suffer to be buried. This may signify, that they will revile and deride all those who before had professed and preached the truth; and thus preserve them from oblivion, by exposing them to ignominy. At the same time, they will use the customary methods of mutual congratulation on an event, which they deem so joyful: supposing that they have at last finally extirpated a race of men, whose examples, doctrines, warnings, and reproofs, alarmed and disquieted their minds, and prevented them from proceeding, without disturbance, in their ungodliness and iniquity. (Notes, Judg. 16:23—31. Mic. 7:8—10. Matt. 27:39—44. John 7:3—10.) But the "triumphing of these wicked men" shall be short; for "after three days and a half," prophetically computed, the witnesses shall rise again from the dead, to the great consternation of their insulting murderers. That is, the Lord will speedily raise up a competent number of witnesses, to stand up for his pure gospel; to the terror of its opposers, who hoped that it was finally extirpated. (Note, 20:4—6.) Nay, these witnesses will be called by "a voice from heaven, to ascend thither," which they will accordingly do, in the sight of their enemies. That is, the apparent extirpation of genuine Christianity in the western church, (the bounds of which are considered in their largest dimensions; for all true protestants are only "witnesses" for the truth, within the dominions of the beast,) will make way for more glorious times, when the ministers and professors of the gospel shall be far more zealous, honoured, and prospered, than before; even as the ascension of Christ to glory was subsequent to his death and resurrection; and preparatory to the success of the gospel.—The outline of the above interpretation was given in the first edition of this work: and since that time, during twenty-four years, the author has had abundant opportunity of reconsidering his interpretation; and of comparing it with those of many other commentators, and with events which have occurred in Providence. He must, however, still avow his full conviction, that the transactions, predicted under the emblems of these verses, have not hitherto taken place.—It is generally agreed, that this chapter coincides in time with the ninth; (Notes, 9:) and that the state of the church, and of the nations in the western empire, is here predicted, as that of the eastern empire had before been. The whole testimony, therefore, against idolatry and popery, in the ten kingdoms, during "the twelve hundred and sixty years," must be intended: and till that testimony is generally suppressed, the witnesses are not slain. The triumphs of the persecutors, in Germany, Bohemia, Spain, or Italy, did not amount to any thing, which can with the least propriety, be called "the slaying of the witnesses;" so long as a public testimony against papal corruptions, and for the true gospel, was borne in any other parts of the western empire.—However we explain the expression, "when they shall have finished their testimony," we must make it agree with this part of the prediction; "they shall prophesy a thousand, two hundred, and sixty days, clothed in sackcloth." Now, if the witnesses were slain at the council of Constance, or by the total ruin of the league at Smalcalde, or at any of the times which different expositors fix upon; it inevitably follows, that they prophesied one, two, or three "hundred days in sackcloth" less than the predicted period: except any will say, that they "prophesied in sackcloth," after their resurrection and ascension into heaven.—The different opinions of eminently learned and able men on the subject, and the extreme difficulty which they all seem to find, in making one part of their interpretations consistent with the others, are powerful arguments in my mind, that they have not fact and truth to bear them out.—The fulfilment of the prophecy seems to me indispensably to require the following particulars: 1st. The general suppression of the public testimony for the truth, and against the grosser perversions of Christianity, in doctrine and worship, throughout all the kingdoms of the western empire: but no such general suppression has taken place, especially in the latter ages of the period in question. 2dly. The open, avowed, and general triumph of enemies, however distinguished; as if the hated cause of true Christianity were finally ruined: but this has never yet been the case, throughout the ten kingdoms, however a part, and comparatively a small part, vainly exulted in some of them. 3dly. The very speedy and unexpected "revival of the witnesses;" and the immediate, general, and extraordinary triumphs of the gospel, in all those countries, where it was supposed to be extirpated.—Whether this will be, as some with much probability think, the last persecution before the Millennium, the event must determine: but the war of the beast against the witnesses, is surely a widely different thing from the war of Christ against the persecutors, which, I apprehend, is meant by the pouring out of the vials, at the opening of the seventh trumpet. (Notes, 16:) During the former, the enemy triumphs, and "the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth," till slain: during the latter, the witnesses and their cause triumph, and their enemies are destroyed by tremendous judgments. Yet these distinct events have, by some respectable expositors, been apparently confounded.—'The death and resurrection of the witnesses, whatever events may be intended thereby, happen, as we learn from the concluding clause of the above passage, before the end of the second wo, and before the coming of the third wo.' Cunninghame. Had this writer, in company with many others, forgot the third verse, when he wrote this, and when he dates the slaying of the witnesses, A. D. 1546? Were the 1260 days of "their prophesying in sackcloth," terminated at that time? Or from what year does he date the beginning of the twelve hundred and sixty years? Certainly this calculation dates it from A. D. 286: earlier by several centuries, than the date hitherto, by almost general consent, assigned to it: or by himself in other places. (Notes, 1,2. Dan. 7:23—27. 8:13,14. 12:5—9.) Indeed it makes it precede the times of Constantine. (Note, 12:3—6.)—If the slaying of the witnesses be future; it is of vast importance that Christians should be aware of it, and act accordingly. It does not follow, from the suppression of the public testimony, viz. the general silencing of faithful ministers, and inhibiting the public administration of ordinances, in the purity and simplicity of Christian worship, through the ten kingdoms, that there will be no true Christianity in those kingdoms. Nay, it is not improbable, that the prevalence of true Christianity will provoke this persecution; that there will be thousands, and tens, nay hundreds of thousands, who secretly, at the hazard of their lives, will meet together, for the worship of God; that books, previously circulated, containing clear and practical religious instruction, will in a very great degree supply the want of public ordinances, during this short interruption: that the persecution itself, and the suppression of the testimony, will so show the odiousness of the persecutors, and the excellency of true Christians, as, by the divine blessing, exceedingly to multiply real believers, during the interdiction; and, in short, that the means previously used, nay, the seed which are now sowing, may be abundantly prospered, in bringing forward the glorious times which shall succeed this event. The term of three years and a half, according to the prophetical calculation of the days, in which the testimony shall be suppressed; and the energy and success with which it shall then burst forth, from the ashes under which it had been smothered; and this, through all the ten kingdoms, appear to me to give an astonishing interest to this view of the subject; as well as most animating motives, now to sow to the utmost that seed, which will then produce the glorious harvest. In many other cases, we should "rejoice with trembling;" but in this, while we cannot but tremble at the prospect before us; we should tremble with rejoicing. Like the believer's death, it will be a dark and painful entrance on scenes inexpressibly delightful: and the approach of it, if perceived, will assure the intelligent Christian, that the final triumphs of the church are at hand, even at the door. —In what way, the accomplishment will take place, the event must show; and it is in vain to argue against the improbability of it; for the dispensations of Providence commonly subvert all our preconceptions of probability.—It should also be noted that this exceedingly depressed state of real Christianity seems only to relate to the western church exclusively: and probably in America, in Africa, in the East Indies, or other parts of Asia, there may be very flourishing churches at the same time.

V. 13, 14. Immediately after the events, intended by the resurrection and "ascension of the witnesses," some terrible judgment will befall a large part of the antichristian city, in which they were slain and lay unburied, especially some one of the ten kingdoms; which will destroy a great number of persons, and so alarm others, as to tend to their conversion, and to "the glory of God" in it.—The original expression "seven thousand names of men," (Note, Acts 1:15.) induces many to think, that this refers to the degradation and destruction of the most renowned and powerful supporters of the papal Antichrist: but the event alone can determine the precise meaning of this. Thus the second wo, or the sixth trumpet will terminate; and behold, the third wo will speedily approach.—Whether the revolutions and desolations in France and on the Continent, during the last twenty years, are specially meant, (as some expositors confidently decide,) our descendants will be more competent to determine than we are. But if the whole, concerning the slaying of the witnesses, be yet unfulfilled, as I decidedly think, that cannot be. —Same hour. (13) The destruction implied in this verse must be coincident with the ascension of the witnesses, at the very same time, or when the prophecy is fulfilled.

V. 15—18. "The little book" has been shown to contain such extensive and important predictions, as abundantly to account for the solemnity with which it was delivered to the apostle. (Note, 10:2—4.) He therefore next proceeds with the subject which closed the ninth chapter. When "the seventh angel had sounded" his trumpet, there were great voices in heaven; all the blessed inhabitants rejoicing with admiring gratitude, because "the kingdoms of this world," which had so long "lain under the wicked one," were becoming willingly subject to JEHOVAH, and to his anointed King, who would reign over them for ever; for his kingdom on earth would continue to the end of time, and in heaven to eternity. (Note, 19:1—6.) Then the emblematical representatives of the whole church were seen to prostrate themselves in adoring worship; praising and rendering thanks to him as the self-existent, omnipotent, and eternal Lord God: because he had "taken to him the power" over the nations, which was his by right at all times, and had now established his kingdom throughout the earth. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. 22: 27—31. 72:8—11. Is. 9:6, 7. Zech. 9:9, 10. Matt. 6:13.)—If this be not addressed to Christ personally, (as some think,) it must be allowed to include him as One with the Father and the Holy Spirit, in the Unity of the Godhead. (Note, 1:3, 8—11.)—What follows is explained by some persons, to relate to the execution of the wrath of God on the nations before the Millennium, for their rage and enmity against his people whom they had slain; but who were figuratively "raised from the dead," in the revival and final prevalence of the gospel, and rewarded in the exceeding prosperity of the church, whilst those who destroyed the earth were exterminated: (Notes, 18: 19: 20:4—6.) but others suppose it to refer to the temporary opposition raised against the gospel after the Millennium, and just before the general resurrection, and the final judgment. (Notes, 20:7—10.) The account, however, in this place, is very brief; for it will be explained and dilated on afterwards, in several chapters: and perhaps both events are compendiously hinted at. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Dan. 2:34, 35, 44, 45. 7:9—14, 19—27.)—'Thus we are arrived at the consummation of all things, through a series of prophecies, extending from the apostle's days to the end of the world. This series has been the clue to conduct us in our interpretation of these prophecies: and though some of them may be dark and obscure, considered in themselves; yet they receive light and illustration from others preceding and following. Altogether they are, as it were, a chain of prophecies, whereof one link depends on and supports another. If any parts remain yet obscure and unsatisfactory, they may perhaps be cleared up, by what the apostle has added by way of explanation.' Newton.

V. 19. This verse introduces a new subject, and should have been placed at the beginning of the next chapter. (Notes, 4:1—3. 15:5—8. 16:17—21. Is. 6:1—4.) The scene of the vision was laid at the temple, which was so far opened, that "the ark of the covenant" became visible: this denoted, that further discoveries were about to be made, relating to the interior parts of religion; for the preceding chapters chiefly referred to the affairs of the empire, and the external concerns of the church. "The lightnings, and voices, and thunderings," were tokens of the special divine presence; and emblems of the terrible judgments which were about to be revealed. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) The next chapter seems to go back to the primitive ages of the church: and we must pass a second time through many of the succeeding periods as before: though principally with relation to the times of the three last trumpets, called the wo-trumpets. (Note, 12:1, 2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The Lord measures his professed worshippers by the rule of his word, and weighs them in his balance. His ministers must also use the same standard: and they who would be approved as inner-court worshippers, must try themselves by the same unerring touchstone. For mere nominal professors are accounted Gentiles before God; and "the holy city" has frequently been trodden under foot by such enemies of the Lord, in the habit of worshippers!—Indeed, for many ages, a small number of "witnesses, prophesying in sackcloth;" have appeared on the part of Christ and the truth; whilst multitudes in great splendour and power

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle sees in vision a travailing woman, watched by a red dragon, that he might devour her offspring; she is delivered of a son; he is caught up to the throne of God, and she flees into the wilderness, 1—6. Michael overcomes, and casts out Satan; joy in heaven on that occasion; and wo denounced on the earth, through Satan's rage and malice, 7—12. The dragon persecutes the woman; she having wings given her flies into the wilderness, and is preserved from his unwearied and varied efforts, 13—17.

3 And there appeared another [†]wonder in heaven; and behold, [g]a great red dragon, having [h]seven heads and [i]ten horns, and [k]seven crowns upon his heads.

4 And [l]his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and [m]the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born.

have been ranked on the side of antichrist, in one form or another. But it is a most honourable employment to unite with these witnesses, however few, despised or persecuted they may be; and to enter a public protest, connected with a holy and exemplary conduct, against the prevailing corruptions of the age and place in which we live. They who do this, are "green olive-trees in the house of God," and "shining lights" in the dark places of the earth. (Notes, Ps. 52: 8,9. Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18.) But we cannot obtain this honour without courage, self-denial, and patience. Christians of this description are "harmless;" and they appear to be helpless and friendless: but it is safer to meet a roaring lion, or to face a battery of cannon, than to injure them: "for the LORD will plead their cause, and spoil the souls of those that spoil them;" (Note, Prov. 22:22,23.) and their pious instructions, friendly warnings, and benevolent prayers, will be as fire to consume their inveterate enemies. Indeed the wrath of God against the persecutors of his saints will either stop the current of his bounty, or turn their comforts into curses, or bring the heaviest plagues on offending nations.

V. 7—12. Neither Satan, nor any of his emissaries, can cut off the Lord's ministers, till they have "finished their testimony," and are ripe for glory. The cruelties and outrages of persecutors on the living, or on the dead, as if they would carry their revenge into another world, cannot hinder the immediate felicity of their souls, the glorious resurrection of their bodies, or their final admission into heavenly mansions. But by such impious barbarities, "Christ is crucified afresh," and Jerusalem is turned into Sodom and Egypt: and the external homage paid to Christ by men of this character, (as the papists adore the crucifix,) seems even to crucify him again in effigy; after the example of those who builded the sepulchres of the prophets, and murdered the incarnate Son of God. (Note, Matt. 23:29—33.)—Determined rebels against the light rejoice, as on some most happy event, when they can silence, or drive to a distance, or destroy the faithful servants of Christ, whose doctrine and conduct are a torment to them: but this joy is soon turned into terror and anguish; for the servants of God will rise again to be swift witnesses against them: then they will behold them ascending to the glory of the Lord, while more terrible vengeance awaits their enemies, than earthquakes, or death in its most terrific forms, can so much as shadow forth.

V. 13—19. Many woes await the impenitent in this world; but the most dreadful wo will, as it were, cause all the rest to be forgotten; and it will arrive quickly. For the seventh angel shall sound; and the inhabitants of heaven will rejoice, because "the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever." At present, prayer for that blessed revolution in the state of the world, is the duty of all real Christians; but shortly they will be called to join in songs of loud thanksgiving and humble adoration "to the LORD God almighty, who is, and was, and is to come." Oh may the name of our "heavenly Father be thus hallowed; may his kingdom thus come, and may his will be done in earth, as it is in heaven;" for his "is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen." (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10,13.)—The anger of the nations against his righteous authority will bring on the great day of his wrath: "the time of the dead, when they shall be judged," will soon come: then shall his faithful servants and friends, both great and small, be most munificently rewarded; and they who have destroyed the earth, shall be themselves destroyed. In the mean time, we, through the rended veil, may see the ark of the covenant, and our God upon a mercy-seat: and if we humbly approach him in this "new and living Way," the most tremendous threatenings of his word, and the most awful judgments of his hand, will do us no harm, and should cause us no consternation.

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1, 2. The prophecies of this book (as it appears to me) naturally divide themselves into two parts; the second of which begins with the last verse of the preceding chapter: though some begin it with the first verse of this chapter. So that we are here brought back to the primitive ages of the church; though they are far more briefly mentioned than those are which followed. Inattention to this circumstance has occasioned much perplexity in many attempts to explain these predictions: for if we do not keep hold of the clue, which has properly been called the internal geography and chronology of the book, imagination will rove at large; and supposed allusions to detached events, in different ages and places, will disjoint the interpretation, and render the whole ambiguous and suspicious.—The church, under the common emblem of "a woman," the mother of individual believers, deriving its original from "heaven," and being destined to return thither, was beheld by the apostle in vision in heaven; with such attire and circumstances as rendered the appearance peculiarly wonderful, or "a sign," being significant of some great events. She was "clothed with the sun;" as an emblem of her being justified, sanctified, and irradiated, by virtue of her union with Christ, "the Sun of righteousness:" she had "the moon under her feet;" to denote her superiority to the reflected and feebler light of the Mosaic dispensation, and to the love of all sublunary objects. her "crown of twelve stars," represented her honourable maintenance of the doctrine of the twelve apostles. Her pregnancy and travailing pains seem to be an emblem of the afflicted state of the church in the three first centuries; during which time, amidst many hardships and persecutions, with fervent prayers and earnest labours, she sought deliverance from her oppression, and an increase of her family, and waited the appointed term, which was to bring a happy crisis to these her sorrows. (Note, Hos. 2:2—5. Gal. 4:17—20.)

Pained (2) Βασανιζομενη. 9:5. 14:10. 20:10. Matt. 3:29. 2 Pet. 2:8. The word shows the extreme sufferings, or tortures, by which the faith and patience of the church were proved, previously to her deliverance, especially immediately before it.

V. 3—6. About the same time another marvellous sight or "sign" was seen in heaven, even "a great red dragon."—"A dragon" was a known emblem of Satan, and of his principal agents or vicegerents on earth. (Note, 7—12. Marg. Ref. g.) "Red," purple, or scarlet, was the distinguishing colour of the Roman emperors, consuls, and generals; even as it has been since of the popes and cardinals. (Note, 17:3—5.) "The seven heads" of the dragon signify the seven hills on which Rome was built; and the seven forms of government which successively prevailed there. (Note, 17:9—14.) "The ten horns" marked out the ten kingdoms into which the western empire was at length divided. (Notes, Dan. 2:31—49. 7:23—27.) But "the seven crowns on the dragon's heads," and not "ten crowns on his horns," showed that the whole power was yet vested in the emperors and senate, at Rome; and not, as afterwards, in the monarchs of the ten kingdoms. This circumstance, which many have not observed, precisely fixes the date of the prophecy, and undeniably proves that it related to the pagan emperors, and not to the antichristian power afterwards mentioned. (Note, 13:1.) "The tail" of the dragon, "drawing a third part of the stars," represented the power of the Romans, which had cast down the princes of one third part of the earth, and reduced their countries to subjection. (Note, 8:7.) This monster appeared to watch the woman, being prepared to devour her offspring, as Pharaoh destroyed the male children of Israel, or as Herod sought the life of Christ. (Notes, Ex. 1:15—22. Matt. 2:16—18.) Thus the Roman emperors and magistrates jealously watched the progress of Christianity from the first, and harassed the church with constant persecutions.—But, at length, the woman was delivered of a male child. During the time of the persecuting emperors the church was greatly increased; until one sprang from her, who ascended the imperial throne, being appointed to be the vicegerent of Christ, in ruling the nations, and crushing the enemies of the gospel, "as with a rod of iron." (Notes, 2:24—28. 6:12—17. Ps. 2:7—9.) Thus the offspring of the church, even Christians in general; and Constantine, with the Christian emperors, who succeeded him, in particular, escaped the rage of the red dragon; and the latter was exalted to very great honour and authority under 10 And [k]I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and [l]the kingdom of our God, and [m]the power of his Christ: for [n]the accuser of our brethren is cast down which accused them before our God day and night.

11 And [o]they overcame him by [p]the blood of the Lamb, and by [q]the word of their testimony; and [r]they loved not their lives unto the death.

12 Therefore [s]rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. [t]Wo to the inhabiters of the earth, and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, [u]because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.

the immediate protection, and by the special favour of God. —New trials, however, awaited the woman, which at length drove her into the wilderness, or rendered her desolate and distressed. For the termination of Pagan persecution made way for those events, which at length terminated in the antichristian power, the continuance of which was fixed to one thousand two hundred and sixty years. (Notes, 11:1—14. 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) But God had provided a place where he would sustain the church when the time arrived: and her flight into the wilderness is here mentioned by way of anticipation. —This interpretation has been objected to, because the sixth verse is supposed to be introduced by anticipation: but, in fact, it is manifest that the apostle thus introduces it; else why does he resume it, with some additional circumstances, after several verses predicting most important events? (14) Yet even then the church is represented only as prepared to fly, not as yet actually fled.—The author has before shown his decided opinion, and stated his reasons for it, that "the little book" contained no more than part of the eleventh chapter: that the slaying of the witnesses is yet future: and that the concluding part of the preceding chapter, to the end of the eighteenth verse, brings the series of predicted events to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Notes, 10: 11:) If then this and the folllowing chapters relate, as undoubtedly they do, to events preceding the Millennium; the sacred writer must in some place go back, and resume his subject: and no part can be selected in which this can so naturally be fixed as the last verse of the preceding chapter, which introduces the beginning of this.—'We would also divide the Revelation into two parts; or rather the book so divides itself. For the former part proceeds, as we have seen, in a regular and successive series, from the apostle's days to the consummation of all things. Nothing can be added, but it must fall somewhere or other within the compass of this period; it must be a resumption of the same subjects; and this latter part may most properly be considered as an enlargement and illustration of the former. Several things, which before were only touched upon, required to be more copiously handled, and placed in a stronger light. It was said that "the beast should make war against the witnesses, and overcome them:" but who or what the beast is, we may reasonably conjecture; but the apostle himself will more surely explain. The transactions of the seventh trumpet are all summed up and comprised in a few verses: but we shall see the particulars branched out and enlarged on into as many chapters. In short, this latter part is designed as a supplement to the former, to complete what was deficient, to explain what was dubious, to illustrate what was obscure: and as the former described more the destinies of the Roman empire, so this latter relates to the fates of the Christian church.' Bp. Newton.—Nothing more fully confirms my opinion that Bishop Newton's outline is the true interpretation, than the dissatisfaction which permanently rests on my mind, after carefully considering those expositions which have been substituted in the place of it. While objections are stated I hesitate, not at once perceiving how they can be answered; but when the interpretation substituted in its place has excited my attention, still more insuperable objections crowd on my mind.—'The man child is the mystic word of God, which is described as the Son of the church, because it is the incorruptible seed, from which all true believers are born.' Faber. The 'mystic word,' according to this statement, is in fact the parent, not the son, of the church: but waving this, if the respectable writer here cited could not make out his system, without having recourse to so indefinite and allegorical an interpretation, of an event evidently most important in the prophecy; I cannot but conclude that his plan of interpretation is, in this respect, erroneous: and I must give that of Bishop Newton the decided preference. Most certainly the subversion of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, and that of the immense ancient system of idolatry, as supported by all the genius, influence, and power of Greece and Rome, was no inconsiderable event, in the prophetical history of the Christian church: and had it not been specially and prominently marked, it might have been thought an extraordinary omission. (Note, 6:11—14.) Whatever the character of Constantine or that of his successor was, the revolution was wonderful, and indeed one of the most extraordinary recorded in universal history. (Note, Zech. 8:20—23.) The whole Pagan system was cast down from its "heaven," its authority and persecuting domination; and the ruler or rulers of the nations professed Christianity, and protected the church. Subsequent corruptions, terminating in still more dire and destructive persecutions, indeed followed, and are particularly foretold: but surely it is natural to suppose that the prophet, if indeed he resumed his subject, to give a more particular account of the periods which he had compendiously mentioned, should go back to the first ages, and in few words mark the deliverance of the church from Pagan persecution, and the revolution in the empire from Pagan to Christian. I by no means think, with Bishop Newton, that Galerius, or any personal enemy to Constantine, is meant by the red or fiery dragon; but the whole Pagan authority and influence, instigated by the devil, (as the papal power and influence afterwards was,) and seeking the destruction of Christianity, and of the Christian rulers and princes who supported it. So that we may understand, as literally as we choose, the language concerning "the old dragon;" only remembering that he "works in" and by "the children of disobedience." (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. 1 John 4:4—6. 5:19.)—Christians are spoken of as exercising the authority of Christ, and ruling the nations with a rod of iron: (2:27.) it can therefore be no objection that the same allusion is made in respect of the first Christian emperors, under whom the most entire revolution, from persecuting idolatry in full domination to the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire, took place.—Some commentators, indeed, would interpret this man child to be Christ himself; but this cannot be meant, for he was born of the church of Israel, not of the Christian church; nor is he ever spoken of as "the Son o the church:" but rather as the Husband, or even Father of it. (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 9:6,7. 53:9,10. 54:4,5. 59:20, 21. John 3:27—36.) The apostle also spake as a prophet, not as a historian; therefore events future to him must exclusively be intended.

V. 7—12. The events here foretold preceded and made way for the flight of the church into the wilderness; (Note, 13—17.) and therefore cannot possibly mean the reformation which took place many ages after that event. The strenuous and combined efforts of the Pagans against the establishment of Christianity, and the destruction of their idolatrous worship was, as I apprehend, represented by "the dragon and his angels" warring in heaven against "Michael and his angels;" perhaps with some reference to the expulsion of Satan and his adherents from heaven, on their original apostacy. (Notes, Luke 10:17—20. John 12:27—33. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) Michael may represent Christ; (Marg. Ref. u.) and "the devil, and Satan," the old slanderer, adversary, and murderer of mankind, was the invisible commander of the opposite army. The former employed as his instruments Christian magistrates, faithful ministers, and believers, as well as holy angels: the latter fought by persecuting emperors, such as Julian the apostate, idolatrous priests, and heathen philosophers. (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) The conflict was long and sharp: but it ended in the total defeat of Satan's army, in the deposing of idolaters from all rule and authority, and in their reduction to the most abject condition. This was represented by the devil being cast out of heaven: for, by the power of idolatrous emperors and magistrates, he had maintained that false religion, by which he had deceived all the world, and seduced them to be his subjects and worshippers; but, by the subversion of that authority, and the subsequent demolition of idolatry, he was cast down from his dignity, as "god and prince of this world," for a time and in a measure. When the Pagan emperors were dethroned, Satan's angels were cast out with him: for both the instruments and ministers of idolatry were laid aside, and even their very idols were destroyed with contempt and execration.—It is remarkable, that Constantine himself, and others of his time, describe these events under the same image of the dethroning of the dragon. 'Moreover, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace gate, with a cross over his head, and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, (who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants,) in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midst of its body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea.' Bp. Newton. This shows how Christians then understood the prophecy; and no doubt they rightly interpreted it. Upon this great victory, the apostle heard songs of praise in heaven; because "salvation and strength were come," the church was delivered from persecution, and its friends advanced to authority; the kingdom of God was openly established, and the power of his anointed Son most gloriously displayed. (Note, 19:1—6.) "For," say they, "the accuser of our brethren is cast out of his dominion," and deprived of his influence: he could no longer lay grievous crimes to the charge of the Christians, for which to put them to death; as Satan had accused Job before God himself, and was ready to accuse others continually, night and day. (Notes, Job 1:9—11. 2:4,5. Zech. 3:1—4.) But this victory was not ascribed to the sword of war, which was only a subordinate means, when matters were brought to a crisis: for it was acquired through the merit and efficacy of the atoning sacrifice of Christ, by faith in his blood, and a bold and holy profession of his gospel; together with "the word of their testimony," even that of those who went forth every where preaching the doctrine of salvation; and "who loved not their lives unto the death," but readily sealed their testimony with blood, when called to it. These were the warriors and the weapons, by which Christianity undermined and subverted the power of the idolatrous empire, and acquired an entire ascendency over their Pagan enemies: and if Christians had continued to fight with these weapons, and such as these, their victories would have been more numerous and glorious, and the effects of them more durable. The "heavens were, therefore, called upon to rejoice, with all the inhabitants of them," or all who were on the Lord's side in this contest. But at the same time a wo was denounced upon the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, or the nations in general; because the devil, and his dethroned agents, would not rest in their disgraced condition: though idolatry was suppressed, it was not destroyed, and its partisans would surely excite fresh commotions. Nay, the devil would be the more furious in his opposition to the gospel, to the ruin of numbers of souls, and to the great distraction of the empire; as he would know that "his time was short," that Pagan idolatry would soon be totally crushed, and that "the Seed of the woman would at length bruise his head:" he would, therefore, take his opportunity of doing all possible mischief to mankind, whilst he had it in his power.—His angels, &c. (9) Note, Matt. 25:41—46.—A short time. (12) This is made an objection to interpreting the prophecy of the ruin of Pagan idolatry: but any limited time is short, compared with the eternal doom awaiting the great enemy of the church and all its coadjutors.—They who interpret it of the Reformation, strangely forget, that the dragon had at the time of his being cast out, "the crowns on his seven heads," and not on his ten horns: (Notes, 3—6. 13:1.) and that this event preceded the 1260 years of the church's abode in the wilderness.

That old serpent, called the devil. (9) Ὁ ὄφις ὁ ἀρχαῖος, ὁ καλούμενος διάβολος. 20:2. 2 Cor. 11:3. A learned commentator has lately endeavoured to prove that the animal, by which the devil deceived Eve, was an ape, or some animal of the ape species.—It is however evident, that the Hebrew word, used Gen. 3:1. never means an ape in the Old Testament. The Arabic word adduced, is indeed one name of the devil: and some words from the same root signify an ape; but they also signify a lion, a wild cow, or any animal, with a peculiar kind of nose. (Richardson's Arabic, Persian, and English Dictionary.)—Waving this, however, are we to suppose, that the inspired writers of the New Testament, kept up, by express words, when not quoting from the Septuagint, the false opinion, derived from that version, that Satan deceived Eve, as concealed in a serpent, when in fact he was concealed in an ape? Is this our reverence for the words of the living God!—Now. (10) Ἀρτι. Matt. 3:15. 26:29. Hitherto. "Hitherto the Lord has helped us." (Note, 1 Sam. 7:12.)—The church and all her friends might praise God, very properly, for deliverance from Pagan persecution, though other trials still awaited her.

V. 13—17. While the idolatrous party, who were the agents of the devil, were constrained to submit to the power of Christian rulers; they still persisted in their persecuting enmity to the church, and tried various methods of re-establishing their ancient worship. Several attempts were made of this kind, during the reign of Constantine. Julian, afterwards the apostate, left no method untried, by which he could hope to effect it. He endeavoured to hinder the liberal education of the Christians, that their ignorance might expose them to contempt, and render them incapable of defending or propagating their religion: he employed writers, of great learning and ingenuity, to ridicule, revile, and reason against Christianity: he excited Arian princes to persecute their orthodox subjects; and in many other ways he attempted to undermine the cause of Christ. At the same time, the devil and his agents, prevailed to corrupt the church with manifold heresies, to deform it with various scandals, and to rend it in pieces with fierce contentions; and these evils grew worse and worse, during the period of the first four trumpets. (Notes, 8:) Thus the way was preparing for the erection of another idolatrous persecuting power, which will be shortly considered. In the mean time, "two wings, as of a great eagle, were given to the woman;" that she might be ready to fly to her place in the wilderness, when the time came. (Note, Ex. 19:4.) These are supposed by some writers to refer to the eastern and western empires, the standard of which was an eagle, and the protection afforded by them was the means of preservation to the church, till the prefixed time of her obscurity arrived. In the midst of the preceding convulsions and heresies, the church was, as it were, preparing to flee away to her retreat, from the fury of her opposers; where she was at length to be nourished, "for a time, and times, and half a time;" or, for three years and a half, forty-two months, or one thousand two hundred and sixty days: but her flight was not completed, till the establishment of the antichristian power spoken of in the next chapter. (Notes, 13:1.) Her continuance in the wilderness, therefore, exactly accords to the time during which the "two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth:" both relate to the same events, and both began and must end together. (Note, 11:3—6.) If the beginning of this term of time be fixed, A. D. 606, it will terminate A. D. 1866: and whatever dates "the slaying of the witnesses" earlier than that time, removes proportionably backward the commencement of this term. (Note, 3—6.) If this event took place in 1546, as Mr. Faber and Mr. Cunninghame suppose; then, beyond all controversy, the 1260 years began about A. D. 286: yet Mr. Cunninghame afterwards dates them A. D. 533. I do not presume to say when it began; but consistency is essentially requisite in our interpretations. (Note, 11:1,2.)—To prevent the escape of the woman, "the dragon cast out of his mouth a flood of water," to carry her away. This is explained by many expositors, with great propriety, of the inundation of the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other barbarous nations, by which the western empire was overwhelmed: (Notes, 8:) for it is known, that the strenuous adherents to paganism encouraged these irruptions, in hopes of subverting Christianity by their means; and no doubt Satan expected to overwhelm the church, when idolaters overturned the empire. But the event proved entirely contrary to all their expectations. "The earth helped the woman, and swallowed up the flood:" the victorious barbarians united themselves to the vanquished Romans, and formed one people with them, in the several provinces of the empire; they even embraced, in form at least, the Christian religion. Ungodly men of various descriptions, from regard to their secular interests, protected the church amidst these convulsions: and the subversion and dismembering of the western empire did not at all help the cause of idolatry; nay, it tended to the propagation of Christianity!—But the dragon being disappointed in this attempt, was the more enraged, and took another method of making war against true Christians, as "the seed of the church." (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) These were but "a remnant:" for superstitions and heresies of various kinds, and corruptions, had long before this increased exceedingly, which afforded the enemy his opportunity for the assault and success predicted in the next chapter.—If the plan of interpretation, before laid down, be well grounded, these verses must, as has been stated, predict the events which made way for the establishment of the persecuting domination of nominal Christians; the flight of the church into the wilderness; and the prophesying of the witnesses in sackcloth, during one thousand two hundred and sixty days. The particulars of these latter events are predicted in the two following chapters; with several things relating to the approach and earnests of the church's delivery, and the destruction of her grand enemy. In the fifteenth chapter there is a solemn pause, as introductory to the subsequent events; and then the prediction proceeds in regular order, to the Millennium, the day of judgment, and the heavenly world. Thus, from the beginning of this chapter, where the prophet resumes his subject, a series of events, succeeding to each other, is predicted; and every part casts light on all that which precedes or follows. But if the predictions of these verses be referred to any part of the twelve hundred and sixty years, or to the end of them; this order is, as it appears to me, without necessity, and without proof, disturbed and deranged; and indeed an entirely new interpretation of all the subsequent chapters, showing that they relate to future events, seems indispensably necessary to preserve the consistency of the interpretation.—As I am fully persuaded, that the transactions predicted in the two next chapters (the concluding part of the fourteenth alone excepted) are already fulfilled: I must adhere to the outlines of Bishop Newton's interpretation, in preference to later systems.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. True Christians, being of heavenly birth, and expecting a heavenly felicity, have "put on Christ," are "clothed in his righteousness," irradiated by his light, beautified by his image, and taught to put earthly things beneath their feet; and they deem it their honour to profess, adorn and recommend the doctrine of the holy apostles. All who are thus minded should pray fervently, and labour diligently, in their several places, for the increase, prosperity, and purity of the church: and ministers should especially abound in these holy employments. For the devil and his instruments are vigilant, united, bold, and unwearied, in their efforts to destroy the religion of Christ; and too generally the "kingdoms of the world" have been seduced into their service: surely then, the servants of God ought not to be timid, heartless, or negligent, in opposing their designs!—It is a striking proof of the wretched state of this apostate world, that so large a proportion of its inhabitants have generally been subjected to men, eminent only for tyranny and cruelty: and it is a great mystery in Providence, that these are left to attempt and effect so many things against his church. They cannot, however, prevent the conversion of sinners, or the final salvation of believers: nor can they withstand him, who is exalted to "the throne of God, to rule over all nations with a rod of iron;" or overcome those who are invested with authority and armed with power by him, for the benefit of his church, and to crush those who persecute it. (Notes, Zech. 4:4—10. 12:2—5.) The Lord has not hitherto indeed generally wrought by the arm of the magistrate; but when he is pleased to raise up rulers to protect his people, and by scriptural means to promote his cause, we should be thankful for them, and avail ourselves of their countenance and assistance: though the church has her place prepared, and her sustenance given her, far more frequently in a wilderness, than in an imperial palace.

V. 7—17. Whilst "Michael our Prince," "his angels," and his servants, fight against "the dragon and his angels;" we need not fear the final prevalence of any enemy, either against the church, or any true believer. The "great dragon, even the old serpent called the devil, and Satan," while he deceives and rules over all the rest of the world, will as surely be prevented from hurting the true church, as he and his angels were cast out of heaven at first. For "salvation and strength, the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ," will renewedly come, from time to time, till the dominion of every enemy be destroyed, and the mouth of every "accuser of the brethren" be stopped. (Notes, Is. 54:15—17. Rom. 8:32—39.) But victory in this holy war can be obtained only "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of the testimony" of his servants. Faith, prayer, a holy life, patient continuance in well-doing, and a willingness to venture or suffer even unto death, with zealous and faithful preaching, are the weapons by which the saints have always conquered; and we must go forth with the same armour, and fight in the same manner, if we would share their triumphs. (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Over such victories all heaven rejoices, and all that love the kingdom of Christ.—But Satan and his agents, however degraded and baffled, will proceed to bring "woe on the inhabitants of the earth:" nay, they rage the more, when their plots are defeated; and multitudes are by them deceived and destroyed. Yet the church still maintains its ground on earth, and believers continually enter heaven: when dangers seem to overtake them, they are furnished with "eagles' wings," to "fly away and be at rest:" when heresies, infidelity, or tribulation, appear ready to overwhelm them, the earth opens and swallows up the flood. Even worldly men give assistance to the church, when the Lord is pleased to make use of them; and she will be preserved for ever, with all the remnant of her seed, "who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1. The apostle, "standing on the" shore, saw a savage "beast rise out of the sea;" that is, a tyrannical, idolatrous, and persecuting power, springing up out of the commotions which took place in the world. All interpreters agree, that the Roman empire, in one form or other, was here intended: and Papists, continuing such, must contend, though against the most conclusive evidence which can be imagined, that Pagan Rome was meant. But Pagan Rome had existed many hundred years when the apostle had this vision; and yet he saw "the rise of this beast."—It may indeed be said that Daniel, in vision, saw the rise of the Babylonian empire, though the rise of it preceded his prophecy; (Notes, Dan. 7:1—3.) so that, this circumstance alone may not be altogether conclusive in the argument: but the reign of this beast, during twelve hundred and sixty years, from whatever period it be dated, must be conclusive: for the Pagan Roman empire, properly speaking, did not continue three hundred years, from the time when this prophecy was delivered; and the very last remains of it were subverted in about four hundred years. Indeed, the whole time, from the building of Rome, to the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was considerably less than eleven hundred years; and even to Augustulus, the last emperor, A. D. 476; that is from its birth, to its death; it lasted at the most only twelve hundred and twenty-eight years: and for the first five or six hundred years of this term, the Romans had not the smallest concern in any thing, which respected the church of God. It is therefore absolutely certain, that the Roman power, as professing Christianity, and not that of Pagan Rome, is meant. The dragon before mentioned had "seven crowns on his heads," but this "beast has ten crowns on his horns." (Note, 12:3—6.) This plainly showed, that a revolution would take place before the time predicted should arrive; and that the dominion would be removed from the imperial city, and divided among ten kingdoms.—The seven heads had indeed lost their crowns, but they had preserved or acquired a name, or names, "of blasphemy." (Notes, Dan. 2:40—43. 7:6—8,19—27. 8:9—12.) Imperial Rome was often called The eternal city, and The goddess of the earth, with other blasphemous titles; and altars, temples, and sacrifices were assigned to her, as a deity: and it will appear in the sequel, how antichristian Rome, after the loss of the imperial dignity, obtained or resumed similar names of blasphemy. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3,4.)—Out of the sea.] 11:7. Notes, 17:7,8, Dan. 7:2,3.

V. 2—4. This beast was without a name, like the fourth in Daniel's prophecy; (Note, Dan. 7:7,8.) but it resembled in divers respects the other three beasts, which that prophet had seen; and thus united the fierceness, cruelty, and terror of all the rest. (Notes, Dan. 7:4—6.) It was indeed the same with Daniel's fourth beast; the same empire, but in one special form: for "the dragon had now given his power, throne, and great authority," to the beast. The dragon may here mean, either the devil, or the devil's vicegerent, the idolatrous Roman empire. (Notes, 12:3—12.) So that when another idolatrous persecuting power had succeeded to that of the heathen emperors; then "the dragon" had transferred his dominion to "the beast," or the devil had appointed another vicegerent: and all the world knows, that this accords to the history of the Roman empire, Pagan and Papal.—The project of re-establishing the old idolatry having failed; a new species was invented: saints and angels succeeded to gods and demi-gods; and persecution was the means employed for supporting it. (Note, 12:13—17.) "The head of the beast, wounded to death," represented the entire subversion of the imperial authority in the time of Augustulus, or when Rome became a dukedom to the Exarchate of Ravenna. (Note, 8:12.) Five of the heads of the beast, or the dragon, (for in this respect they are the same,) were superseded, before the apostle's time, namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes, but at the time above mentioned, the sixth received a deadly wound. (Note, 17:9—14.) It was, however, afterwards healed, by the revival of the imperial name and dignity, in the person of Charlemagne, or Charles the great, who was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 800: and this head subsisted ever since in the emperors of Germany, or of 'the holy Roman empire,' till subverted by recent revolutions. For the emperor of Austria, doubtless by constraint, has resigned the title; and the present ruler of France (1813) has usurped it for a season. But many things seem now (1815) to be reverting into their former channel; and it is too early to judge how this revolution may terminate. After Charles had been thus proclaimed emperor, the temporal and ecclesiastical rulers mutually strengthening each other, the Roman power became again formidable, and "all the world," or all the earth, was astonished to behold that empire revived, which seemed to be totally extinct: so that a superstitious and idolatrous obedience was rendered to this temporal authority, as engaged to support the ecclesiastical tyranny of the Romish church. Thus they virtually "worshipped the dragon, who gave his power to the beast;" by submitting without reserve, to the same idolatrous persecuting power as before, only in another form: and they "worshipped the beast" as one, who never had his equal on earth, or in heaven, and who would surely crush all that presumed to oppose him. Thus the old idolatry was fully re-established, with new names; and the worship of idols, or creatures, is in effect worshipping the devil.—Some explain "the deadly wound," inflicted on one head of the beast, to mean the revolution which took place, when Christian emperors succeeded the Pagan persecuting emperors; and the healing of this deadly wound, the subsequent establishment of another idolatrous persecuting power, bearing the Christian name. The two interpretations agree in the grand outline; and the nature of this work precludes the particular consideration of subordinate questions.—Who is like, &c. Beast. (2) Θηριον, a wild beast, a beast of prey.

V. 5—7. To this monstrous savage beast "was given a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies."—It will soon be stated as the author's opinion, that the ecclesiastical power of Rome was the agent, and the Pope the speaking image of his beast: (Notes, 11—17.) and every one knows what blasphemous and enormous claims of 'His Holiness,' 'Infallibility,' 'Sovereign of kings and kingdoms,' 'Christ's vicegerent on earth,' yea, 'God upon earth,' have been spoken by this mouth of the beast. Power also, or authority, even the secular empire, was given him to continue, or rather to practise, or to prosper in his undertakings, for forty-two months or twelve hundred and sixty years. Some copies read, "Make war:" (7) and no doubt that is included. This term coincides exactly with that during which "the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth." (Notes, 11:3—12.) This beast would, during this period, "open his mouth in blasphemies against God;" combining with the ecclesiastical power in its usurpations, and in entrenching upon the peculiar honours and prerogatives of God himself. "He would blaspheme the name of God," by requiring all men, at the instigation of the ecclesiastical power, to render that worship to creatures, which belongs to God alone; "and his tabernacle," or true Christians, by stigmatizing, anathematizing, and murdering them, as heretics: "and them that dwell in heaven," by scandalizing angels and departed saints, as if they sacrilegiously sought and were pleased with the idolatrous worship rendered to them; and by ascribing to the saints a variety of ridiculous actions, which they never did. (Note, 18:20.) It was also "given to the beast to wage war against the saints, and to overcome them;" and no computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the church of Rome. A million of the poor Waldenses perished in France; nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain in less than thirty years after the institution of the Jesuits; the duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death in the Netherlands, by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years. The inquisition destroyed by various tortures one hundred and fifty thousand Christians, within thirty years. These are a few specimens, and but a few of those which history has recorded: but the total amount will never be known, till "the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Note, Is. 26:20,21.) These were put to death by the secular arm; by that power, of which the empire was the head, and which subsisted in ten kingdoms: for the persecuting ecclesiastical power, condescended to employ kings and emperors, as the executioners of its murderous decrees!—Mr. Faber has here very justly pointed out an inaccuracy in bishop Newton, who seems to confound this beast, or the secular empire, in all the ten kingdoms, with the little horn predicted by Daniel, which accords to the second beast, afterwards mentioned. (Note, 11,12.) Yet as the secular power executed the persecuting decrees of the ecclesiastical, and gave its power to that beast; the things, stated by bishop Newton as accomplishments of this prophecy, were evidently such; though he has not, with his usual accuracy, marked the manner in which this took place. (Notes, Dan. 7:7,8,23—27. 11:36.)

V. 8—10. By the means above mentioned, the beast maintained his dominion over the inhabitants of the western world, and indeed in many other places; and all worshipped him, by the most abject submission of body, soul, and conscience, except "the remnant according to the election of grace," (Note, Rom. 11:1—6.) "whose names were written in the book of life," belonging to "the Lamb that had been slain, from the foundation of the world."—It is not indeed quite clear, whether Christ be here said to "have been slain from the foundation of the world," that is, in the purpose of God, and the efficacy of his blood to the salvation of all believers; or whether the names of the persons spoken of were "written in the book of life, from the foundation of the world," as the elect of God: but the language is in a parallel text more explicit. (17:8. Notes, 20:11—15. 21:22—27. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)—This prophecy was of that importance, to the encouragement and direction of believers, during 'the reign of the beast,' as well as for the due understanding of the greatest part of this book, that the attention of every one was especially called to it. (Notes, 2:10,11. Matt. 13:9. Marg. Ref. f.) For the persecutors would assuredly be destroyed, in the same manner as they had destroyed others: (Notes, 17:—19:) yet here would be the trial of "the faith and patience of the saints;" to bear up under such complicated dangers and sufferings, and of so long continuance, beyond the example of all former times; and to persevere in faith and obedience through them.—Faith and patience would be more wanted by the saints, and have more to try and exercise them, and for a longer time than in any other persecution whatever.

V. 11, 12. This second "beast" did not come up out of the sea, or from wars and tumults, as the first did; (Note, 1.) but "out of the earth," silently and gradually, as plants spring up: (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) and it "had horns like unto a lamb;" denoting, that it was a spiritual dominion, professedly derived from Christ, and exercised in a gentle manner. It was, therefore, the emblem of the Roman hierarchy; and his two horns have, very probably, been supposed to signify the regular and secular clergy of that church: as the other "beast" was the emblem of the temporal authority exercised in the ten kingdoms of the empire, in support of that spiritual tyranny

The second beast is elsewhere called "the false prophet;" (16:13. 19:20.) which abundantly confirms this interpretation. 'In the language of symbols, horns are kingdoms; consequently the horns of an ecclesiastical beast must be ecclesiastical kingdoms. Now I know not what idea we can annex to an ecclesiastical kingdom, subservient to the head of an ecclesiastical empire, except that of a regularly organized body of ecclesiastics, subject primarily to their own immediate superior, and ultimately to the head of the whole empire.' Faber. Thus the regular clergy, or the different orders of monks, are subject each to the principal of his order, who himself is subject to the church and bishop of Rome: and, in like manner, the secular clergy, or parochial ministers and others connected with them, are subject primarily to their ordinary, or diocesan bishop; he, to the archbishop, primate, metropolitan, or patriarch; but all to the church and bishop of Rome. And as they are enjoined celibacy, this subjection, and their devotedness to the common cause of that church, are most entire and efficacious.—But though the beast "had two horns, like a lamb," yet "he spake as a dragon," or with all the tyranny and cruelty of the persecuting Roman emperors. (Note, 12:3—6.) And the high claims of authority, and the peremptory commands, menaces, and decisions of the Roman hierarchy, are well known. The second "beast" is likewise the minister, adviser, or agent, of the first beast, and "exerciseth all his power before him." Accordingly the different orders of monks, as well as the secular clergy of Rome, have always possessed immense influence in the affairs of the kings and nations belonging to that communion: their principal ministers of state have generally been cardinals, or other ecclesiastics; the magistrate has been engaged to use his sword to enforce their decrees, or execute their sentences against heretics; and bloody wars without number have been waged in support of their antichristian domination. In return for these services, they "cause the earth to worship the first beast;" they have always been the enemies of civil liberty, and the supporters of tyranny, and even of the unlawful and most iniquitous commands of those princes who supported their authority; which is a kind of idolatry, as it exalts the will of man above that of God. So that tyranny upholds them, and they uphold tyranny; they enslave men's consciences, and help kings to enslave their persons; and in both respects enforce idolatry. The ecclesiastical power 'is the common centre and cement, which unites all the distinct kingdoms of the Roman empire; and by joining with them, procures them a blind obedience from their subjects; and so it is the occasion of the preservation of the old Roman empire, in some kind of unity, and name, and strength.' Whiston.—Implicit obedience, however, to the authority of the beast, as supporting idolatry, and requiring men to worship creatures and images, under heavy penalties, must be especially meant.—'Here we have a plain prediction of some spiritual power, ... which should arrogate to itself universal or catholic authority in religious matters; which should coexist upon the most friendly terms with the ten-horned temporal empire, instigating it to persecute during the space of forty-two prophetic months, ... all such as should dare to dispute its usurped domination, and which in short should solve the symbolical problem of two contemporary beasts, by exhibiting to the world the singular spectacle of a complete empire within an empire. Where we are to look for this power, since the great Roman beast was divided into ten horns, ... let the impartial voice of history determine. ... Daniel, who fully delineates the character of the little horn, is entirely silent respecting the two-horned beast. John, who as fully delineates the character of the two-horned beast, is entirely silent respecting the little horn. —The little horn and the two-horned beast, act precisely in the same capacity; each exercising the power of the first beast before him: and each perishing in one common destruction with him.' Faber. (Notes, Dan. 7:7—14,19—27. 8:9—12.)

V. 13—17. The second beast maintains his power by "doing great wonders." (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) These, whether they be human impostures, or wrought by the agency of Satan, "he doeth in the sight of men to deceive them," and "in the sight of the first beast" to serve him; but they are not performed either by the power, or for the glory of God. (Notes, Ex. 7.22,23. 8:7,8. Deut. 13:1—5. Matt. 24:23—25. 2 Tim. 3:6—9.) The fire may allude to the miracles wrought by Elijah; (Notes, 1 Kings 18:36—39. 2 Kings 1:9—12. Luke 9:51—56.) and predict the vain pretences of the beast to miracles of that kind. But some interpret it thus: 'Heaven is a symbol of the church, and the earth, of the Roman empire. The darting forth of fire out of the church upon the secular empire, must mean solemn interdicts and excommunications, pronounced against those who dared to oppose the authority of the beast.' Faber. The miracles, however, of which the advocates for popery boast, as certain marks of a true church, are here shown to be the distinguishing stigma of antichrist: that is, such ambiguous and suspicious miracles; or indeed any miracles, if wrought in support of idolatry, in opposition to the doctrines of Scripture, and to justify the persecuting cruelty of those who profess them. By these means "the two-horned beast," or the regular and secular clergy, deceived the inhabitants of the earth, and induced them to make "an image of the beast," or the temporal authority of the empire, as it formerly subsisted in the reigning emperor at Rome. This image has been variously interpreted. But is not the pope, as a temporal prince, the very image of the ancient emperors? Is he not, as the pretended infallible head of the church, the great idol of all zealous papists? and is he not, in both respects, the representative of the whole antichristian tyranny? Can we then doubt who this "image" is? Or can we help being amazed at this exact and circumstantial prediction of such improbable events, so many hundred years before they took place? The two-horned beast, or the Roman clergy, as represented by the consistory of cardinals, which assembles at the death of a pope, with the full concurrence of the rulers and people at large, through the papal dominions, "makes the image," when they elect a private person to that exalted station; and, by putting him in possession of the supreme authority, they "give life to him" as "the image" of the ten-horned beast, and "enable him to speak," by uttering his bulls and mandates, as well as to use the names of blasphemy before mentioned. (Note, 5—7.) But before this, they robe and crown the image which they have made; they place him on an altar, and kiss his feet, and they call this ceremony adoration! Like other idolaters they make their idol, and then worship him: and an ancient medal, struck on that occasion, has this motto, Quem creant, adorant, 'whom they create, they adore!' Then they use all their power and influence to support his authority, through all the nations of their communion: and concur in persecuting, even unto death, all those who will not join in the same idolatrous observance of it. 'The pope is the principle of unity to the ten kingdoms of the beast; and he causeth, as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his supremacy, to be put to death. In short he is the most perfect resemblance of the ancient Roman emperors; is as great a tyrant in the Christian, as they were in the heathen world; presides in the same city, usurps the same powers, affects the same titles, and requires the same homage and adoration. So that the prophecy descends more and more into particulars, from the Roman state, or the ten kingdoms in general, to the Roman clergy in particular; and then to the pope, the head of the state as well as of the church, the king of kings, as well as the bishop of bishops.' Bp. Newton.—The two-horned beast likewise performs other offices to the first beast; by excommunicating all those who refuse subjection to its usurped dominion, and conformity to the established worship, and thus exposing them to various temporal incapacities and punishments, as outlawed persons. So that, of whatever rank they be, they must either be marked in their right hands and their foreheads, with "the mark, name, and number of the beast," as slaves and cattle are branded and numbered; that is, they must openly profess the religion of the church of Rome, and conform to its idolatries and superstitions, as the bondslaves of the beast and his image, in body, soul, and conscience, and so be "marked with the name of the beast;" or they must be inhibited from all commercial dealings, and even excluded from the most needful intercourse with mankind. Very many instances of this sort are recorded in history; and indeed the spirit of it pervades the whole system. Thus the second beast, though appearing "as a lamb, spake like a dragon."—By the mark of the beast, some understand the sign of the cross, which is used, not only in a most superstitious, but even an idolatrous manner, continually as discriminating, and as required by authority in the church of Rome.—Some explain the making of the image, to mean the establishment of image-worship; and the various impostures, by which the deluded votaries were induced to suppose, that the images lived, moved, and spoke. But, whoever that had [d]the mark, or [e]the name of the beast, [f]or the number of his name.

18 [g]Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is [h]the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six.

consults the marginal references, (u—f.) will perceive such a difference, and even contrast, between this image, and all others, mentioned in the whole Scripture, (and doubtless other priests have possessed ingenuity, and bestowed pains, in deluding the people,) that he will hesitate at a conclusion, which makes this image in no respect essentially different from the others. If, however, life and speaking, might be interpreted to mean the priestcraft, which made the people think the images lived and spoke; surely what follows must be interpreted in a most unnatural manner, when the occasion taken by the priests to persecute, is spoken of in this language, "and the image of the beast shall both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed," &c. It is indeed argued, that the original should be rendered, "made an image to the beast, or for his use;" and not of him: but instances may be brought from the Greek writers of exactly similar expressions, where the meaning is indisputably according to our translation of this passage. Indeed, if a literal image, or literal images be meant; and yet the beasts are not supposed to be literal beasts, or the horns to be literal horns; this blending of the literal with the figurative, in the same prophecy, is not only contrary to the rules of sound interpretation, but a direct violation of that laid down by the respectable writer, who has adopted this interpretation. 'The whole book, excepting those few passages which are avowedly descriptive, must be understood either literally throughout, or figuratively throughout: otherwise it will be impossible to ascertain the meaning designed to be conveyed.' Faber. On the other hand, if the pope be really this image, the language is both natural, and extremely expressive; and it has been fully verified in numerous instances, by papal interdicts, excommunications, and similar measures. The objections of late brought against this interpretation, have led me to perceive, that if preceding expositors could have foreseen, what their successors would have objected to their statement, they would have expressed themselves more cautiously and accurately: but they have produced no hesitation as to the meaning of the emblem.—It is true, that the pope may be considered, as in some sense the head also of the two-horned beast; yet, that beast continues to exist, when there is no pope; and the cardinals, as representing the whole ecclesiastical power, are, during that vacancy, the head of the beast; and in that character they create the pope, to be the image both of the secular and the ecclesiastical idolatrous persecuting power, the representative of the whole. He does not derive his dominion from any hereditary right, or from popular election, or from regal appointment; but he is the creature of the Romish clergy: yet, being created by them, he is the object of their worship, and exercises, or at least claims a right to exercise, absolute authority over both them and the kings of the earth. Indeed this claim was long generally admitted by the ten horns of the beast, though in some instances it was disputed. (Notes, 17:9—18.) This seems sufficient for the purpose, and, amidst so many emblems, it could hardly be supposed, that no shadow of coincidence should appear.—'It may be observed, that when the first, or secular beast is represented, as making war with the saints, and overcoming them; it is no where said, that the second, or ecclesiastical beast, should do more than cause them to be killed. The little horn has always worn out the saints, by delivering them over to the secular arm, not by slaying them himself. The inquisitors, with a disgusting affectation of lamb-like meekness, are wont to beseech the civil magistrates to show mercy to those unfortunate victims, whom they themselves have given up to be consigned to the flames.' Faber. (Note, 5—7.)—There are various other interpretations, by different writers, of several things in these chapters, chiefly explaining them of recent events in France; but not judging any of them either well grounded, or even supported by probable arguments, I did not think it needful to introduce them in this work. The books, written expressly on the subject, must be referred to: and, in general, the writers succeed better in attempting to refute each other's interpretation, than in establishing their own; where they materially differ from the expositors, who wrote before these late transactions.—Mr. Cunninghame, if I rightly understand him, supposes the corrupt church itself to be the image; as formed by the joint consent of the clergy and laity: but of what is the corrupt church the image? It cannot be the image of the beast, or the secular idolatrous persecuting power, (Notes, 1—7.) as this image is expressly said to be; (11) nor, as it appears to me, of any thing, except itself, or of those who made it, who are nearly or quite the same persons. 'It was a common fashion in St. John's time, for every heathen god to have a particular society or fraternity belonging to him: and the way of admitting any into these fraternities was; 1. By giving him some hieroglyphic mark in the head, or forehead, which was accounted sacred to that particular god; as that of an ivy-leaf to . . . the fraternity of Bacchus: 2. By sealing themselves with the name of that god: and 3. With that number, which the Greek letters of their name did make up.' Grotius in Cressener. I suppose, the name of their idols. Slaves also were generally branded with the names of their owners.

V. 18. Mention having been made of "the number of the beast," or that "of his name," the apostle next proposed to men's consideration the number itself; introducing it by saying, "Here is wisdom;" or intimating that the discovery of the name of the beast from the number, would be a proof of a man's discernment. "Let him," therefore "that hath understanding, count the number of the beast:" who then shall censure or ridicule those who attempt to do it? (Note, 1:3.) For it was "the number of a man;" either such a number as men use, or a number implying in it the name, title, or distinguishing characteristic "of a man." Now the Greek word Lateinos signifies the Latin man; or the man of Latium, from which city the Romans derived their original and their language; and this word, according to the genuine orthography contains in numerical letters, exactly the "number six hundred and sixty-six." The church of Rome is properly the Latin church, and they use the Latin language in every thing. The beast, therefore, or the authority exercised through the ten kingdoms in support of that church, of which the pope is the living image, may well be called LATEINOS. But though the apostle wrote in Greek, he yet used a few Hebrew names in this book; so we may perhaps think he alluded to a name in that language: and it is most astonishing that the word Romiith in Hebrew, which answers to Lateinos, signifying Roman, contains in numerical letters exactly six hundred and sixty-six. Nor can any other two words be produced from two different languages, which so nearly agree together in meaning, and exactly stand for the same number in numerical letters: the coincidence is really most surprising As John could only refer to the Greek or the Hebrew language in this matter; and as the number of the name of the Latin man, or the Roman, in both languages is exactly the number of the beast; I see no occasion to doubt, either about the beast or his number, especially as Irenæus in the second century put the same construction on it.—Romiith is indeed feminine; but it may signify either the Roman church or kingdom, the Hebrew words for both which are feminine. The word Latinus, Lateinos, is, however, in all respects by far the most satisfactory, notwithstanding this coincidence.—'No name, though it may possibly comprehend the number six hundred and sixty-six, can be the name of the beast, unless it equally answers in every other particular to the prophetic description of that name.—Lateinos is at once the name of a man, (the ancient king of Latium, whence Rome had its origin,) the title of an empire; and the distinguishing appellation of every individual in that empire: and when the sum of its numerical letters is taken in the Greek language, . . . it amounts to six hundred and sixty-six. On these grounds then, I do not hesitate to assert, that Latinus, and nothing but Latinus is the name of the beast; for in no other word, descriptive of the revived temporal beast, or the papal Roman empire, can such a fatal concurrence of circumstances be found.' Faber.—The mark of the beast is the sign of the cross, used in endless superstitions, and even idolatries.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The enemies of the church carry on their designs, under a variety of odious and terrifying forms: they often unite, or divide among them, the fierceness and cruelty of savage beasts, with the subtlety and poison of serpents: but if it will answer their purpose better, they appear as gentle "lambs," in order that, when they have opportunity, they may speak "as dragons," and "lord it over God's heritage" with cruel tyranny. (Notes, Matt. 7:15—20. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) They have commonly possessed great power: and when any of the heads of this Leviathan seemed to be broken in pieces, they have been again healed; and in another form they, even to this day, return to the combat. Indeed, they have much encouragement from the world: for men are far more disposed to admire, and to celebrate the praises of these monsters of iniquity, (as if none were like them, or could stand before them,) than to hear the word of God from his faithful witnesses, or even to adore and submit to the Son of God himself! But the mouths, even of those, who "open them in blasphemy," were given by that God whom they thus affront; and that power is derived from him, which they use in "making war against his saints:" nor can men of any description reign over the nations, or practise against the church, further than he sees good to permit. (Notes, Ps. 76:10. John 19:8—12.)—All will, in one way or other, be "deceived, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb that was slain," "according to the eternal purpose which he hath purposed in himself." "The vengeance that is written" will surely be executed on all persecutors and wicked oppressors; but the saints need very much "faith and patience," when their lot is cast in evil times; and they should cry unto God continually, that they may be "faithful unto death, and so receive the crown of life."—Ungodly priests, and tyrannical rulers, support each other's usurpations, iniquities, exactions, and oppressions: whilst the one by war, or cruel executions, destroy all opposers; and the other deceive or terrify men by lying miracles, false doctrines, anathemas, and ecclesiastical censures. But all these evils should be considered as illustrative of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart, (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.) and as endearing to us the love of God in Christ Jesus. The review ought also to make us thankful for our civil and religious liberties, in this highly favoured land. We are exposed to no interdicts, no prisons, no cruel tortures or death, for not worshipping after the manner, or at the dictate, of either prince or priest; nor are we tempted, by circumstances of danger, to profess and subscribe what we do not believe, or conform to what we do not approve; though alas! numbers choose to do it, "for filthy lucre's sake." (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) We shall therefore be doubly inexcusable, if we do not embrace and profess the truth of Christ, and worship the Father according to the appointed ordinances: or if we do not pray for the peace of those under whose mild government we enjoy so many privileges; observing the rule of the wise man, to "fear God and the king, and not to meddle with those that are given to change." But he who has wisdom and understanding in these things, will see that all the enemies of God are numbered and marked out to destruction; that the term of their power will soon expire, and that all nations shall at length submit to our "King of righteousness and peace."

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. The apostle, having been shown the foregoing particulars concerning Papal Rome, the antichristian secular and ecclesiastical domination of the Beast, and its image, with all idolatry and tyranny connected with them; had next a vision of the true "church in the wilderness," during the same period: which had special reference to the darkest times, previous to the dawning of the reformation. He "looked, and behold a Lamb," the emblem of Christ, "stood on mount Sion," where the temple was built, which was a type of the true church and of heaven itself; and with him were "a hundred and forty-four thousand" persons. (Notes, 7:1—8.) This seems a mystical number, the twelve patriarchs multiplied by the twelve apostles, and both multiplied by a thousand; as if the hundred and forty-four were leaders of thousands: so that there was a considerable number of true Israelites, and of those who held the apostles' doctrine, and marched under their banner, in the most degenerate times; being the successors of that remnant, which was found in the first three centuries, during the persecutions of the heathen emperors. (Notes, 7:9—17. Rom. 11:1—6.) As the worshippers of the beast "were marked with his name and number;" (Note, 13:13—17.) so these disciples of Christ had "the name of his Father" written in legible characters on their foreheads: they were his worshippers, they bore his image, they avowed and evidently showed that they belonged to him. It is evident from history, that there were such persons, in the darkest times, who ventured and laid down their lives for the truth and worship of the gospel. Indeed these were the same as the two witnesses during the times in which they lived, only represented under another emblem. (Notes, 11:1—14.)—This multitude were "singing a new song before the throne," with a voice loud as that of mighty rushing waters, or that of thunder; yet exquisitely harmonious, and accompanied with the music of harpers of consummate skill. No doubt "the new song," which they sang, accorded to that which has been already considered. (Notes, 5:8—10. 7:9—12. Ps. 33:2,3. 96:1. 98:1—3. Is. 24:16. 42:10—12.) This was sung in the presence of the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers; (Note, 4:6—8.) and none could learn it, but the redeemed. (Note, 2:17.) For, as it related immediately to redemption; the proud, the impenitent, the unbelieving, and the carnal, could not understand the nature or the glory of this subject: nor could angels join in it, not being "redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb;" though they unite in worshipping him, as worthy to receive all honour and blessing. (Note, 5:11—14.)—The antichristian church at an early period discouraged and reviled marriage, enjoined celibacy on priests, immured numbers of both sexes in convents, extolled virginity as almost essential to piety and purity, and ranked its virgins with the saints and martyrs of the primitive times. (Note, 1 Tim. 4: 1—5.) But these unnatural restrictions and attempts to introduce a kind of life on earth, which in general only suits the inhabitants of heaven, made way, not only for exorbitant spiritual pride, but also for the most unnatural and detestable licentiousness, and for crimes too horrid to be specified: and at the same time, the church was polluted with the most manifest and abominable idolatry, or spiritual fornication. (Notes, 17:1—6.) But, says the apostle by the Spirit of prophecy, these true Christians "are they, who are not defiled with women." "Marriage being honourable in all, and the bed undefiled," the clause may be understood in the literal sense, and also figuratively: "For," says he, "they are virgins," even such as the Scripture commends, who are espoused to Christ, and unfeignedly love him, who are faithful and obedient to him; and deeming themselves his alone and wholly, wait for the completion of their sacred union with him; and in the mean time prefer suffering and death to the spiritual fornication and adultery to which all others are given up. (Notes, 19:1—6. Cant. 1:3. 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) They therefore "followed him, whithersoever he went," through persecutions and tribulations, into obscurity, or into prisons, with self-denial, obedient faith, and patient hope; "taking up their cross," and copying his example of meekness, purity, and love. (Notes, John 10:26—31. 12:23—26.) These were the persons, "who had been redeemed from among men," being actually interested in the atonement of Christ; and they were consecrated to God "as first-fruits," (for whose sake he spared others,) and to the Lamb, "as purified unto him, to be his peculiar people, zealous of good works." (Notes, Tit. 2:14.) They were not hypocrites, but upright in their repentance, faith, and love; and they held, professed, and preached the true doctrine of Christ: so that they were accepted and sanctified persons, against whom no charge could be alleged "before the throne of God." (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. John 1:47—51.)—'The hundred and forty-four thousand appeared to the apostle as standing on the mount Sion, or in the true church, because they constituted the persecuted church in the wilderness: (Rev. 12:6—14.) and as the followers of the beast have the mark and name of the beast; so have these the seal of God impressed, (Rev. 7:3.) and the name of God written on their foreheads. They alone are able to learn the new song of the heavenly harpers, because they alone are the worshippers of the one true God, through the one true mediator Jesus Christ; the adherents of the apostacy offering up their devotions to other objects, and through other mediators. They are virgins, undefiled with women, inasmuch as they are free from the pollutions of idolatry; which is spiritual whoredom and adultery. They follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, resolutely adhering to the religion of Christ in troublesome times, as well as in prosperous ones, and fleeing into sequestered valleys and wild deserts, rather than relinquish their profession of the gospel. They are "redeemed from among men," being rescued, by the almighty power of divine grace, from the corruptions and abominations of Babylon; and they are consecrated as the first-fruits of Christianity, unto God and the Lamb, an earnest and assurance of a more plentiful harvest, first, at the era of the reformation, and afterwards at the yet more glorious era of the Millennium. "In their mouth was found no guile:" inasmuch as they handle not the word of God deceitfully, like popish venders of indulgences, and preachers of purgatory, human merit, and idolatry; but faithfully and simply declare the way of everlasting life. And they are "without fault before the throne of God," having "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb;" God not imputing their trespasses unto them, but accounting them as if they had never sinned, through the imputed righteousness of Christ, who was "made sin for them," "in order that they might be made the righteousness of God in him." By these hundred and forty-four thousand, I understand peculiarly the depressed church in the wilderness, previous to the time of the Reformation: for history sufficiently demonstrates, that there have been in every age some faithful worshippers, who consented not to the general apostacy, but who prophesied, although in sackcloth, against its abominations.' Faber.—They who object to this, saying that the church was then in a depressed state but here exulting and triumphing with joyful praises, seem to forget the Christian's motto: "sorrowful, but always rejoicing." "We glory in tribulations also, &c." (Notes, Is. 24:13—15. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:32—39.)—Zion also was indeed a conspicuous place in the church; but not like the celebrated cities of Greece and Rome. It is very obscure, and little noticed in profane history. (Notes, Ps. 2:4—6. 87: Is. 12:4—6. Heb. 12:22—25. 1 John 3:1—3.)—First-fruits. (4) Note, Jam. 1:16—18.

V. 6, 7. It is generally admitted, by the best intrepreters, that the three angels, introduced in these and the following verses, were emblematical heralds of the progressive reformation from popery. When, therefore, the extent and prevalence of the power of the beast, at its full height, had been predicted in the foregoing chapter; the diminution and weakening of it, as introductory to his destruction, is intimated in this. Some explain the proclamation of the first angel, of the ninth, tenth, or eleventh centuries: and no doubt there were even then both princes, bishops, and councils, who struggled against the worship of images, and the other grosser abominations of the church of Rome. Yet they generally concurred in supporting the dominion of the beast; though they were earnest that it should be exercised in a different manner as to some particulars. Such, however, as were real Christians, and entered a proper protest against the prevailing corruptions of the church, whether in the imperial palace, or in the conclave, (if that was ever done,) may properly be ranked in the number mentioned in the preceding verses: for these evidently relate to a later and more public and general protestation. Others, however, seem to fix the time of their accomplishment too late; and so leave a large vacant space in the series of predicted events; and then crowd too many into the remaining periods.—We may, therefore, I apprehend, interpret this "first angel," messenger, or herald, to be an emblem of those who first publicly erected the standard of reformation, and who contended for "the everlasting gospel" of Christ, in opposition to all the innovations and usurpations of the beast, his image, and the false prophet. This honour seems to belong to the Waldenses and Albigenses, who had the true gospel among them; avowed its everlasting obligation and excellency; opposed it to the authority of popes, councils, and persecuting princes; declared the pope to be antichrist; and propagated their doctrines with zeal and success, and multiplied into a vast number of churches. And after immense slaughter had been made of them by persecutions and bloody wars, the residue still retained their tenets, and being dispersed into other countries, they rapidly carried "the everlasting gospel" with them; as an angel, a messenger of peace to men, flying through the midst of heaven; so that the Lollards in England, and the Bohemians in Bohemia, and the adjacent regions, and many others in different places, seem to have principally learned the gospel from them; nay, the reformation itself appears to have sprung from the seed which they sowed, and watered with rivers of their blood. So exact was the prophecy, that they had "the everlasting gospel to preach to the inhabitants of the earth!" (Note, 11:3—6.) They also loudly called on men to fear and glorify God, as the hour of his judgment was at hand; and to worship the Creator of all things, as revealed in the gospel, by refusing to join the worship of idols, and that of the beast and his image. (Notes, 19:9,10. Acts 14:11—18. 17:22—29.)—Some respectable commentators explain these verses of Luther, almost exclusively; and suppose, that many things, in his situation, character, and testimony, remarkably answered to it. I cannot however think, that the previous public testimonies against the beast, are wholly passed over, or that an individual, however illustrious, occupies so conspicuous a station in this concise prophecy. But I am much farther from being convinced, that more modern events, or the present zeal for missions, is meant; because the testimony of the angel, or messenger, was evidently borne against popery, not heathen idolatry; and the worship of saints and angels, and of images of God, is as real idolatry, as that of the pagans.—Everlasting, &c. (6) 'It is styled, "The everlasting gospel;" being like its divine Author, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" in opposition to the doctrines of the beast, and the false prophet, which shall be "rooted up, as not of the heavenly Father's planting." Matt. 15:13.' Bp. Newton.—It is objected, that the reformers did not "preach to every nation, kindred, and tongue:" and it may be answered, that neither did the apostles, in the strict literal import of the words; (Col. 1:6,23.) nor have any others to this day. But it was the doctrine and desire of the reformers, that the gospel should be preached throughout the earth.—The angel "had the everlasting gospel." This is by Mr. Cunninghame supposed to be the book containing the gospel, and he seems principally to explain it of the British and Foreign Bible Society—Far be it from me to withhold or deduct from the honour justly due to that Society: when, by the astonishing success of atheists and infidels, "the enemy came in like a flood," "the spirit of God has" surprisingly "lifted up a standard against him;" and the Bible Society has been honoured in this, as in no small degree THE STANDARD BEARER. But we must not interpret prophecy by our partialities, or even most legitimate affections; and the order of events, in the whole arrangement of the prophecy, requires a far different interpretation.

V. 8. If we explain the first angel, as the herald of the dawning of the reformation, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries; we may properly explain this of the Bohemians and others in the fifteenth, who were their genuine offspring and successors. Some of these persons, with still greater confidence and vehemence than the Albigenses, declared Rome to be mystical Babylon, and the pope and church there to be antichrist; and they endured severe persecutions for these protestations, and for their profession of the gospel. John Huss and Jerom of Prague, especially, were perfidiously and cruelly burned by the council of Constance; which council was, in fact, the united power of the whole antichristian beast. These heralds announced the fall of mystical Babylon, as the ancient prophets had done that of literal Babylon, long before the event. (Notes, Is. 21:6—9. Jer. 50:2,5 51:7—9.) Neither was this doom more certain, than it would be just; as she had corrupted and intoxicated the nations, not only with her love-potions, as a seducing harlot, but by the wine of the wrath of her fornications, terrifying men into idolatry by fierce persecutions. (Notes, 17:1—6. Jer. 25:15—26. 51:7.) As Rome was mentioned under the name and emblem of a Gentile city, so her idolatry was called fornication rather than adultery; as it generally is in Scripture, when committed by the professed worshippers of God. (17:2.)—Bishop Newton explains this verse of the Waldenses, and the foregoing verses of more ancient events; on the contrary, Mr. Faber interprets those verses of Luther, and this of Calvin and his associates. This, however, seems to me to render individuals far too prominent in so concise a prophecy. Nor should I have mentioned the names of John Huss and Jerom of Prague, except as they were the mouth, or voice, of a very large body of men, delivering its testimony in the most public manner conceivable, and sealing it by martyrdom.—Still, I observe, that the grand outlines are clear; and commentators in general are agreed about them: so that the subordinate differences of opinion do not affect the main argument.—Some indeed would explain this verse of future times, because Babylon is not yet totally fallen: but this deranges the whole plan of interpretation, adopted by the ablest expositors, which is the only clue that can lead us through its mazes; and this would introduce perplexity and uncertainty. Nothing is more common in prophecy, than for future events, as absolutely determined, to be spoken of in the present or past time: and the same words were spoken of literal Babylon, long before her destruction. (Marg. Ref. h.)—'The clue that has principally conducted me through both parts of the Revelation, is following the series of history, and the successive order of events. After the description of the two beasts, secular and ecclesiastical, whose power was established according to my hypothesis in the eighth century, but, according to most commentators, much sooner; there would be a very large chasm, without the prediction of any memorable event, if these prophecies relate to the time, immediately preceding the fall of Antichrist and the Millennium.—What a long interval would there be without any prophecy; and how thick would the events follow afterwards! For all the particulars ... to the end of the nineteenth chapter must be fulfilled before the Millennium.' Bp. Newton.—It is also worthy of notice, that about the era above mentioned, the opinion began to be publicly avowed, by several persons, that the church, court, and city of Rome, were Babylon, and so inevitably doomed to destruction.

V. 9—11. This third angel and his proclamation "with a loud voice" may be explained of Luther, and his loud, rough, and vehement protestation against the idolatries of the church and bishop of Rome, and that whole antichristian fabric: yet we must also take in all his coadjutors and successors, and all the effects of this combined and persevering protestation, to this day, and even beyond it. His voice, with that of those who were raised up in divers countries to join him, and to follow up the assault, was indeed very "loud." They attacked the beast with far more vehemence, than any who went before had done. They not only declared him to be antichrist; but they carried their researches into the idolatries, iniquities, and impostures of the whole papal system; and showed that it was utterly incompatible with the religion of the Scriptures, and founded in ignorance, usurpation, avarice, and hypocrisy. And they insisted strongly on the necessity of separating from so corrupt a church; boldly retorting the charge of heresy and schism, which the popish party brought against them, and fully proving it against their opponents. Thus they induced whole nations to cast off all regard to the church of Rome, and engaged vast multitudes to protest against popery as a damnable religion, not only in the persecuting tyrants who imposed it, but in all who, even from dread of persecution, or from more corrupt motives, conformed to it: and this was exactly the purport of the third angel's proclamation. They loudly insisted upon it, that all who adhered, with a blind and devoted attachment, to the beast and his image; (Notes, 13:11—17.) professing their abominable doctrines, conforming to their idolatries, concurring in their cruelties, and reducing their principles to practice; (being intoxicated with "the wine of the wrath of her fornications;") would drink of the unmingled wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation. (Notes, 16:17—21. Ps. 75:8. Is. 51:17—20. Jer. 25:15—17.) Yea, that they would be tormented with fire and brimstone, or be cast into hell, to be tormented in that flame; that this would be "in the presence of the holy angels," who would applaud the justice of their punishment; "and in the presence of the Lamb," who would pronounce and execute the sentence upon them, for their opposition to his gospel, and for giving his mediatorial glory to saints and angels: and "that the smoke of their torment would ascend up for ever and ever." The words translated "for ever and ever," are the most energetic which are found in the whole Greek language, to signify eternity, and seem incapable of any other meaning. (Note, 7:9—12.) The passage, therefore, evidently predicts the clear and strong manner, in which these reformers would protest and argue against purgatory; and insist upon it, that the wicked will be "tormented in hell for ever:" and a subsequent verse evidently opposes the same doctrine, by showing the immediate happiness of believers after death. (Note, 12,13.)—Every one, who is at all conversant with the writings of the reformers and their successors, knows that they generally declared, without hesitation, that popery was a damnable religion. Mr. Hooker, in Queen Elizabeth's time, brought himself into suspicion, and was engaged in a controversy, because he asserted, with much caution, and many distinctions, that papists might be saved: and, whatever contempt may be cast on their bigotry, in this day of false candour, liberality, and disregard to the Scriptures; it is worthy of serious consideration, whether this passage do not warrant by far the greatest part of what these reformers advanced on that subject; though they might not always exactly distinguish between those "who hated the light," and those whose eyes were too weak to endure its effulgence, when it broke in upon them all at once.—To explain this most energetic passage, (which beyond doubt predicts a general and most awful protestation against the leading tenets of popery as damnable, in all who embrace and adhere to them, as well as in the inventors and imposers of them,) to signify any testimony, or protest made in a single kingdom, as for instance in England, seems to me a total departure from the grand scale, on which these prophecies should be interpreted; and as in all respects inadmissible. Nor can any temporal judgments on collective bodies, be the fulfilment of the awful denunciation, which evidently relates to individuals, and to each individual who is guilty: and if words can convey the idea of eternal punishment, it is here denounced. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, 19: 7—21. 20:7—10,11—15. Matt. 25:41—46.)—It may also be very well worth inquiring, whether there be not some remains of the papal superstition and corruption, even in protestant churches? And how far they, whose grand object it seems to be, to contend most, and most vehemently, not to say virulently, for that which admits of the least scriptural proof, or no scriptural proof, keep at a proper distance from this tremendous warning.

V. 12, 13. When the doctrines above mentioned began to be openly propagated, terrible persecutions were raised: it was therefore added, "Here is the patience of the saints." They would have abundant need to exercise patience and perseverance, in obeying God and holding the true doctrine of Christ, amidst the bloody race of inquisitors and persecutors, who kindled fires on earth to torture and burn them, though in vain they called for fire from heaven to destroy them; and who, by most horrid cruelties, together with wars and massacres, destroyed incredible multitudes, in opposing the progress of the reformation. (Notes, 13:8—10. 17:6.) To encourage the saints to patience, in suffering for the truth even unto death, the apostle showed, that he "heard a voice from heaven," ordering him to write, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," (or in the true faith and hope of the gospel; Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) "even from henceforth."—This verse has much perplexed many commentators, in respect of its prophetical meaning and connexion: but, upon the plan which we are now pursuing, nothing can be more obvious. The doctrine of purgatory, with indulgences, human merits to be sold by the church, masses and prayers for the dead; was one principal source of wealth, influence, and authority to the clergy of the church of Rome. This also first stirred up the spirit of Luther, who began his attack by protesting against these atrocious practices: and, by examining the Scriptures, he and his followers established it, as a certain truth, in the judgment of immense multitudes, that there was no such place as purgatory; but that the wicked, when they die, go directly to hell, and believers immediately enter heaven. Now what words could more aptly predict this change in the sentiments of a large proportion of professed Christians, than these do? It is evident, from the internal chronology of the book, and from the series of predicted events, that the reformation was here intended; and the apostle was ordered to write, just in this place, (probably he knew not on what account,) "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth:" that is, from this period believers will generally understand that encouraging truth; and not have to encounter the fears of purgatory, or to apprehend a delay of their felicity, when seized with the agonies of death, or called to suffer martyrdom for Christ's sake. Indeed, it is an undeniable fact, that the expectation of immediate happiness, was the joy and support of those numbers, who were burned alive, or otherwise cruelly martyred, during those times.—This "voice from heaven" was attested by an internal suggestion of the Holy Spirit, who assured the apostle, that believers rested after death from all their labours and sufferings, and consequently could have no purgatory to fear; and that their works followed them, to prove the sincerity of their faith, and to ensure a gracious reward. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—40. Rom. 2:7—11. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Marg. Ref. f.) —Rest. (13) 11. Note, Heb. 4:3—11.—To explain this of any state of the church on earth, is doing the greatest violence imaginable to the words of the apostle.—"Dying in the Lord," and being immediately happy, must refer to individuals, and to another world. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26.)

V. 14—20. Thus far we have generally proceeded, by the guidance of past events, and considerable satisfaction seems to have been obtained in explaining these prophecies; but here, I apprehend, that direction almost wholly fails us. This supposition is confirmed by the evident inability of expositors to make any regular and consistent application of the subsequent chapters, except as coincident with those things which have been already considered. Under this persuasion, of which further reasons will be afterwards assigned, I shall not obtrude mere conjectures on the reader, nor attempt to pry into "things not seen as yet." Hitherto, in general, the ground has seemed good, and the road in a measure plain; and I have felt some confidence, as well as used caution, in the progress: but caution must be almost my only companion cloud, [u]Thrust in thy sickle, and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap; [o]for the harvest of the earth [p]is [q]ripe.

16 And [q]he that sat on the cloud [r]thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped.

17 And another angel [s]came out of the temple which is in heaven, he also having a sharp sickle.

18 And another angel [t]came out from the altar, [u]which had power over fire; [x]and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes [y]are fully ripe.

19 And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, [z]and cast it into the great wine-press of the wrath of God.

20 And [a]the wine-press was trodden [b]without the city, [c]and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse-bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

CHAPTER XV.

A vision of seven angels prepared to execute judgments; with the triumphant song of the church on that occasion, 1—4. Seven vials are given to the angels for that purpose, and the temple is filled with smoke, 5—8.

AND [a]I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, [b]seven angels having the seven [c]last plagues; for in them [d]is filled up the wrath of God.

2 And I saw as it were [e]a sea of glass [f]mingled with fire; and them [g]that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, [h]stand on the sea of glass, [i]having the harps of God.

3 And they sing [k]the song of Moses [l]the servant of God, [m]and the song of the Lamb, saying, [n]Great and marvellous are thy works, [o]Lord God Almighty; [p]just and true are thy ways, [q]thou King of [r]saints.

4 [r]Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, [s]and glorify thy name? for [t]thou only art holy: [u]for all nations shall come and worship before thee; [x]for thy judgments are made manifest.

and monitor in what now remains: for the country is unknown, and no guide is to be found, who understands any thing with certainty concerning the road. The exact and surprising fulfilment of many and complicated predictions, through the course of about seventeen hundred years, has been shown; which is a real demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures: but we must bequeath to posterity the satisfaction of understanding, and being filled with adoring wonder, at witnessing the accomplishment of the remainder. The prophecy has been evidently traced down to the reformation; and this may include all, which has intervened to this day, or shall intervene, till "the slaying of the witnesses," and their resurrection; if these events be, as I firmly believe, yet future. (Notes, 11:7—14.) Whether the events here predicted precede or follow the sounding of the seventh trumpet, or third wo-trumpet, I cannot absolutely determine: but they seem evidently to relate to the fall of popery; and perhaps give a succinct intimation of what is more fully predicted in the next and following chapters. (Notes, 16:—19:)—The preceding judgments and transactions not having produced a voluntary and effectual reformation in the kingdom of the beast; the iniquity of the nations of which it is constituted is filled up, and they become ripe for judgments. (Notes, Gen. 15:16. Zech. 5:5—11. Matt. 23:29—39. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) These judgments are emblematically described as a harvest and a vintage: and, as the latter succeeds to the former in the course of nature, so it is subsequent to it in the prophecy, and will be by far the most terrible. (Note, Joel 3:9—17.)—Christ appeared to the apostle in vision, "like unto the Son of Man," in human nature; upon "a white cloud," the emblem of his holy, righteous, and mysterious dispensations; his "golden crown" signified his supereminent authority, and "his sharp sickle" his terrible vengeance on his enemies. "The angel out of the temple" may signify the ministers of the gospel, as employed to announce the approach of these judgments: and "the second angel coming out of the temple," to reap the vintage, may represent some executioner, or succession of executioners, of the wrath of Christ on the opposers of his authority: while the third angel from the altar, who had power over fire, giving orders to the second angel to reap the vintage, implies, that these judgments would constitute a sacrifice to divine justice, and consume as with fire those who had despised or perverted the atoning sacrifice of Christ. (Notes, 8:1—6. Ez. 9:1—7.) The "casting of the vintage into the wine-press of God's wrath," and the "treading of it without the city," (as being no part of the true church,) can only be explained by the event. (Note, 11:1,2.) But it is remarkable, that sixteen hundred furlongs, or two hundred miles, is exactly the length of the papal dominions in Italy; and probably these will be deluged with blood, in a most awful manner, which is represented by language tremendously hyperbolical. (Notes, Is. 34: 63:1—6. Jer. 51:33. Matt. 13:36—43.)—Some expositors, who have written since this interpretation was first made, (A. D. 1791,) decide with confidence, that the bloody scenes, lately exhibited in France and on the Continent, are the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning "the harvest;" though the vintage may be yet future, nor do I at all doubt, posterity will clearly see, that these events began to accomplish the prediction. I cannot however think, either that at so early a stage we are capable of determining on the subject; or that a more general and almost universal display of divine vengeance, on all the kingdoms of the beast, (those perhaps excepted, but those only, who have fully and decidedly cast off its dominion,) is intended by the harvest; as well as still more tremendous scenes by "the vintage." (Notes, 19:17—21. Ps. 149:7—9. Ez. 39:1—20. Mic. 7:14—17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The Lord reserves a remnant to himself in the worst of times, who dissent from the prevailing idolatries and abominations; who profess his truth and bear his image; who sing the praises of redeeming grace, in strains which none else can learn; who cordially love and devotedly cleave to him; who "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, being the first-fruits of the earth;" who "are Israelites indeed," "in whose mouth is found no guile," and who "are without fault," being fully accepted, and really sanctified, before the throne of God. May it be our prayer, our endeavour, yea our ambition, to be found in this honourable company! If we have a good hope, that we are thus distinguished; we ought to do every thing in our power, as well as beseech the Lord continually, that faithful ministers, like beneficent angels, "flying through the midst of heaven," may carry "the everlasting gospel," and preach it to "all people, nations, and languages;" that so sinners may fear and glorify God; and turn from all their idols and iniquities, to worship the great Creator, and to wait for his Son from heaven, who shall speedily come to be our Judge. These events faith anticipates, as if they were already accomplished.

V. 9—20. Subtle deceivers, and they who have been betrayed into their delusions by pride, unbelief, a carnal mind, love of sin, and fear of man, will ere long "drink together of the wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation:" and, however men may flatter or excuse themselves, when they conform to corrupt and sinful customs or impositions, they will find at last that the Lord deeply abhors such prevarication.—Let, therefore, such as "fear the reproach" or the wrath of men, and are tempted to disobey God, remember that awful "torment," the smoke of which ascendeth up "for ever and ever." For the modern quietus of a purgatory, after the day of judgment, is as destitute of scriptural foundation, as the purgatory before that awful season, which is maintained by the church of Rome; and they who die in their sins, will too late find, that the punishment of hell will endure "for ever and ever." "Here then is the patience of the saints," to venture or suffer any thing, in "obeying the commandments of God," and professing "the faith of Jesus:" may God bestow this patience upon us, that we may be ready, should times of persecution overtake us! We have the best reasons in the world for this conduct; as a "voice from heaven," attested by the Holy Spirit, assures us, that "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord;" that they 'immediately' rest from their labours, and that 'their works follow them," to ascertain their title to unspeakable felicity, and the degree of glory reserved for them: while their persecutors, and all wicked men, are ripening for the harvest and vintage of divine vengeance; and will soon be "cast into the wine-press of the wrath of God." Nor can the most tremendous judgments ever witnessed on earth, or even heareafter to be witnessed, as inflicted on nations ripe for vengeance, give so much as an adequate idea of the vengeance awaiting impenitent workers of iniquity.

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1—4. CHAPTER XVI.

The first angel pours out his vial on the earth, and the worshippers of the beast are plagued with a noisome sore, 1, 2: the second, on the sea, which becomes blood, 3: the third, on the rivers and fountains, which also become blood; and the angel of the waters celebrates the justice of God, in thus visiting bloody persecutors, which is confirmed by one from the altar, 4—7. The fourth angel pours his vial on the sun; and men, scorched with fire, blaspheme God, 8, 9: the fifth, on the seat of the beast, with the miseries caused, and the blasphemies excited, 10, 11. The sixth angel pours his vial on the Euphrates, to prepare the way of eastern kings, 12. Three unclean frogs, from the mouth of the beast, stir up kings to war against God, 13, 14. A warning to Christians, 15. The seventh angel pours his vial into the air, and the last plagues are tremendously finished on Babylon, &c. 16—21.

AND [a]I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to [b]the seven angels, Go your ways, [c]and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

2 And the first went, and poured out his vial pression, the sacred name of CHRISTIAN. These plagues must therefore be coincident with the last wo-trumpet, in great measure at least. (Note, 11:15—18.) The second part of this prophecy has been traced from the latter years of the sixth trumpet, to the reformation, nay, to the present era: and to go back into former ages, to find out events, which may answer to the subsequent predictions, deranges the whole plan of the book, and reduces the interpretation to ambiguity and uncertainty. Our key has hitherto opened the most intricate wards of these predictions, without violence; that is, as far as to the latter part of the sixth trumpet: but no writer, as it appears to me, has yet (A. D. 1815) succeeded in what follows. For the commencement of it is, according to my view, precisely the time in which we live; as appears from a due consideration of the twelve hundred and sixty years of the reign of the beast.—Different computations, indeed, have been made of the period, when these years will end: yet none seem to have proved that they will terminate more early than A. D. 1840, while many think they will not end till A. D. 2000. But, whether sooner or later, it seems probable that the time is not arrived: and, therefore, that "the pouring out of the vials" has not yet begun.—Some indeed of late have fixed the beginning of this period (the 1260 days) to A. D. 533; when the emperor Justinian issued certain edicts, acknowledging and supporting the Pope, or the bishop of Rome, head of the whole church: and thus they compute, that they terminated A. D. 1792, the era of the French revolution.—If they be correct, of which I presume not to judge, then the pouring out of the vials has indeed begun: but they, who shall live at the latter end of this century, or the beginning of the next, will, I have little doubt, know that it has but just begun.—The apostle had mentioned great woes, which would come under the three last trumpets: (8:13. 10:7. 14:19,20.) yet when the seventh trumpet was sounded, he mentioned, almost exclusively, the happy effects of it, to the end of time, without speaking particularly about the woes. (Note, 11:15—18.) But here he resumes that subject, and prophetically shows what woes would follow the sounding of that trumpet. Nothing is more important, in explaining prophecies, than to determine, as far as we can, which events are past, and which are to come: under this conviction, I must proceed to consider what follows, in general, as in futurity: and shall therefore not detail any of the interpretations, or conjectures, which have been made of them, with relation to past events; because I cannot myself find any satisfaction from them.—The great and marvellous sign, which the apostle saw in heaven, the scene of his visions, (Note, 4:1—3.) implied, that very interesting and extraordinary events were about to be revealed: for seven angels appeared, who had it in charge to inflict "the seven last plagues." But before he saw the effects of their ministry, he records an introductory vision, representing the joy and triumph, which the church would express on that occasion.—The "sea of glass, mingled with fire," (Note, 4:6—8.) is very differently explained: but as the persons referred to stood upon it, we cannot so well understand it of the Fountain, in which they had washed away their sins. Perhaps it was emblematical of the tempestuous times, during which believers then lived; the slippery and fragile nature of their standing considered in itself, and the fiery trials which they endured. Some think that ἐπὶ (translated on) may be rendered at: and that being "mingled with fire," denotes the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit. (Note, Matt. 3:11, 12.)—They, however, who were conquerors over the beast, who had cleaved to the truth and will of God, and had refused subjection to the spiritual tyranny of antichrist, or to be branded as his slaves, (Note, 13:13—17.) stood on, or at, this "sea of glass mingled with fire," unhurt and undismayed; as the children of Israel passed through the Red Sea, or standing on its shore, saw their enemies dead before them. (Notes, Ex. 14:26—31.) Feeling, therefore, a holy assurance of their own safety, and a triumphant joy in the prospect of the destruction of their persecutors, they "sang the song of Moses, the servant of God:" they praised the Lord for their deliverance, as Israel by orders from Moses had done; (Note, Ex. 15:1—21.) and they sang "the song of the Lamb," the new song before mentioned. (Notes, 5:8—10. 7:9—12.)

Thus they celebrated the "great and marvellous works" of God, the almighty Lord of all; and his justice and faithfulness, as in Christ Jesus "the King of saints," the Protector, Comforter, Ruler, and Portion, of all his redeemed people. In this view, they inquired, who would not, or ought not, to "fear," adore, and glorify the name of JEHOVAH; seeing he only was holy: therefore neither the worship of idols, nor the names of blasphemy, used by the beast and his image, were any longer to be endured: for the time was arrived, in which all should come and worship before the Lord; as his judgments had been, and were then about still more and more to be made manifest. (Marg. Ref. k—x.)

V. 5—8. (Note, 11:19.) The appearance of glory about the mercy-seat in the most holy place, "the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven," was an emblem of the appearance of God in heaven as reconciled to sinners, through Jesus Christ. "The seven angels," coming forth thence, showed, that these judgments would be executed on the enemies of the church, in mercy to the people of God, while the white clothing and golden girdles, worn by these ministers of vengeance, represented their holiness, and the righteousness and excellency of these awful dispensations. "The living creature," one of the four, an emblem of the gospel ministry, (Note, 4:6—8.) giving the vials to the angels, implied, that the preaching of the truth would be instrumental in bringing the judgments, which were written, upon antichristian opposers: and the temple being filled with smoke, showed the darkness of those dispensations, and the horror, which would envelope the enemies of God, whilst these plagues were executing. (Notes, Ex. 40:34,35. Lev. 9:22—24. 1 Kings 8:10—14. 2 Chr. 5:12—14.)—It is also highly probable, that the same judgments, by which the antichristiar power, and other enemies of the church, shall be destroyed, will be employed to purify even the less corrupt parts of it; and in proportion to the degree in which unscriptural usages are contended for and imposed, or scriptural truths and duties are neglected, even professed protestant churches will drink of the cup. (Notes, Is. 59:1,2.) 'God will purify his church by such signal judgments, as shall arouse the attention of the whole world.' Bp. Horseley. So that the happy estate of the true church, as perhaps implied by "entering into the temple;" will not commence, till by the same awful dispensations, obstinate enemies shall be destroyed; and lukewarm, superstitious, or formal Christians shall be purified. Thus whatever is anti-scriptural or unscriptural in every company being purged away, the whole, brought to purity, unity, and spirituality, in worship, discipline, doctrine, and practice, shall be firmly established. (Notes, Zeph. 3:9—17.)

The temple. (5) Ὁ ναὸς. The holy of holies seems to be meant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The many plagues, which the wrath of God inflicts on the wicked, contain things "great and marvellous:" but none can fully understand them, till they have passed through the waves and fiery trails of this evil world, and are made victors over all their adversaries. Yet, while "we stand upon the sea of glass mingled with fire," we should anticipate the triumphs which await our final deliverance; and attempt "the song of Moses and of the Lamb:" and new mercies continually demand new hymns of praise. The fuller knowledge we acquire concerning the wonderful works of God, the more zealously we shall celebrate his infinite greatness and excellency, as "the Lord God almighty," the Creator and Ruler of all worlds: but his title of Emmanuel, the "King of saints," will peculiarly endear him to us. Who, that considers the power of his wrath, the value of his favour, or the glory of his holiness, would refuse to fear and honour him alone? for his praise is above heaven and earth. May "all nations," therefore, "come and worship before him," and accept of his salvation! This prayer will be answered, when his tabernacle shall be opened, the executioners of his vengeance on obstinate rebels shall have executed their commission, and the seven vials have been poured out. In the mean time, let us adore his justice and truth, and not dare to object to his deep designs: for when we shall witness the completion of the whole, we shall see him perfectly glorious both in mercy and in judgment.

[d]upon the earth; and there fell [e]a noisome and grievous sore upon the men [f]which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

3 And the second angel poured out his vial [g]upon the sea; and [h]it became as the blood of a dead man; [i]and every living soul died in the sea.

4 And the third angel poured out his vial [k]upon the rivers and fountains of waters: [l]and they became blood.

5 And I heard [m]the angel of the waters say, [n]Thou art righteous, O Lord, [o]which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus.

6 For [p]they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; [q]for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another [r]out of the altar say, [s]Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial [t]upon the sun; [u]and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire.

9 And men were [v]scorched with great heat, and [x]blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: [y]and they repented not [z]to give him glory.

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial [a]upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was [b]full of darkness; and [c]they gnawed their tongues for pain,

11 And [d]blasphemed [e]the God of heaven, [f]because of their pains and their sores, [g]and repented not of their deeds.

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial [h]upon the great river Euphrates; [i]and the water thereof was dried up, [k]that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.

13 And I saw [l]three unclean spirits [m]like frogs come [n]out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of [o]the false prophet.

14 For they are [p]the spirits of devils, [q]working miracles, [r]which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of [s]the whole world, [t]to gather them to the battle of that great day of [u]God Almighty.

15 Behold, [x]I come as a thief. [y]Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, [z]lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The angels were next ordered, by a voice from the temple, to pour out the contents of "the vials," censers, or cups, which they had received; and which were emblems of "the wrath of God" to be poured out on the antichristian empire, and on all who adhered to it; and indeed on all the opposers of pure Christianity.—As the first four trumpets were so many stages in the destruction of the western empire, and the fifth and sixth showed the extinction of the eastern empire: so these vials mark the gradual desolation of the Roman church, and the antichristian tyranny of the kingdoms which support it: the one being the pagan idolatrous persecuting power; the other, the papal idolatrous persecuting power, the beast to whom the dragon had given his seat and empire. (Note, 13:2—4.) This circumstance occasions a similarity of some of the vials to the trumpets. A resemblance also is found between these vials, and several of the plagues of Egypt; to which Rome may be compared for tyranny, cruelty, and enmity to the people of God. (Note, 11:7—12.) Whether "the noisome and grievous sore," produced by the pouring out of the first vial, is to be understood literally, with respect to terrible pestilences, or in a figurative meaning, the event must determine. But the plague will be peculiar to the avowed and devoted adherents of the beast and his image; which seems to be intended of the others, though not so expressly mentioned. (Marg. Ref.)—Mr. Faber, without hesitation, interprets this plague of the atheistical spirit, which has long secretly pervaded the nations, adhering to the Roman church; and which broke out so extensively and fatally about the time of the French revolution. I am by no means disposed to argue against this interpretation: yet I am not able to adopt it, as a probable opinion; even if "the pouring out of the vials' may, in the order of the predicted events, be allowed to begin at so early a period; which seems to me inadmissible. Many others, beside devoted papists, were involved in the effects of this atheism and infidelity; but the predicted judgment is stated as selecting them for its exclusive objects.

V. 3—7. (Note, 8:8—11.) "Seas, rivers, and fountains," turned into blood, are proper emblems of vast slaughter and devastation. Yet "the angel of the waters," who was appointed to preside over them, or to be "a ministering spirit" in these dispensations, celebrated the justice of the eternal Lord, who had determined to punish, with such calamities, the blood-thirsty murderers of saints and prophets; and in appointing them, as it were, "blood to drink." (Notes, 17:3—6. 18:20. 19:1—6. Ex. 1:22. 7:21—23.) And another angel, "from under the altar," (Note, 6:9—11.) as speaking in the name of the holy martyrs, concurred in these praises; and also declared the truth of "the Lord God almighty," in thus fulfilling his ancient predictions, and his promises to his church.—If the events here predicted be still future, the fulfilment of the prophecy alone can clearly explain it. Mr. Faber, however, interprets the whole passage, of the bloody transactions in France and on the Continent, which have occurred during these last twenty years. I presume not to decide, whether his opinion be well grounded or not: yet I object to it for these reasons. 1st. The stage, on which these tragedies have been acted, seems by no means large enough for the completion of the prophecy. France, and the countries connected with it, form only part of the kingdom of the beast; and several countries belonging to it, have hitherto been little affected by these sanguinary measures; though perhaps they may ere long be involved in them: in fact many since the time when this was first written, have been, though not in that degree, or to that extent, which the prophecy seems to require. 2dly. The term, since the commencement of the French revolution, seems too short to answer to the idea, excited by this prophecy, of the judgments to be inflicted: when it is considered in how few verses the most interesting events perhaps of two or three hundred years are comprehended. 3dly. I doubt whether the time for the pouring out of the vials is arrived; and whether it will arrive, till after the middle of this century.—It seems, however, still more improper to suppose all the seven vials coincident, and all as having been begun already to be poured.

V. 8, 9. (Note, 8:12.) Whether burning seasons producing drought and famine, or some other judgment figuratively described, by the scorching heat of the sun, be intended, the event must show. But the extreme distress of the sufferers, instead of inducing them to glorify God, by confessing, repenting of, and forsaking their sins, will irritate them to blaspheme the name of God, and so tend to the increase of their guilt and final condemnation. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10,11, 17—21.)—These verses are interpreted by Mr. Faber, to mean the present tyranny of the ruler of France, over that nation, and the other kingdoms of the beast, on the Continent. Not being disposed to controvert this interpretation, and much less to subscribe to it, I only again observe, that in my view, our posterity, at the end of this century, will be more competent judges of this subject than we can be.

V. 10, 11. This predicts some great calamity to Rome itself, yet of such a nature as will darken the whole antichristian empire. (Notes, 18:) But it will only excite the sufferers to more horrid blasphemies, and more desperate defiance of God.—Interpreters of these prophecies in general allow, that this vial is not yet poured out: and this is a sufficient reason, why a commentator should decline giving any conjecture, in what manner so compendious and so obscure a prediction will be fulfilled. When fulfilled, it will cease to be obscure.

V. 12—16. If the river Euphrates is here to be understood literally; some eastern nation or nations may be expected to invade Europe, or to meet the forces of the antichristian power, in the western parts of Asia, perhaps in Palestine, as the executioner of the Lord's vengeance on the kingdom of the beast. But as Rome is mystical Babylon, and as Babylon stood on the river Euphrates, and was both enriched and protected by it: perhaps we may understand, by the drying up of the Euphrates, such an enfeebling of the power

CHAPTER XVII.

An angel shows John the persecuting idolatrous power which was to be destroyed; under the emblem of an infamous, but splendid harlot, riding on a scarlet-coloured beast, with a golden cup in her hand, her name inscribed on her forehead, and drunk with the blood of the saints, 1—6. He explains the vision to him, 7—18.

AND there came [a]one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and [b]talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; [c]I will show unto thee the judgment of [d]the great whore [e]that sitteth upon many waters;

2 With whom [f]the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

3 So [g]he carried me away in the Spirit [h]into the wilderness: and I saw [i]a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, [k]full of names of blasphemy, [l]having seven heads and ten horns.

4 And the woman was [m]arrayed in purple and scarlet-colour, [n]and [o]decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having [o]a golden cup in of Rome, and increase of that of its enemies, as shall embolden and excite the nations to attack her. These events, however, will threaten the destruction of that whole kingdom and domination: so that "three unclean spirits, like frogs, will come out of the mouth of the dragon," as representing Satan, who gave his power to the beast; "out of the mouth of the beast," or antichristian empire; and "out of that of the false prophet," or the antichristian church and clergy. (Notes, 13.1—12.) That is, emissaries, commissioned by them, and instigated by unclean spirits, being loathsome, and croaking, and intruding themselves into every place, to the mischief of all, (Note, Ex. 8:1—6.) will go forth to promote idolatry, pretending to work miracles in support of their doctrine; and to collect "the kings of the earth, and of the whole world," even all in every place who favour that design, that they may make one united effort against the cause of God: and thus they will be "gathered for the battle of the great day," in which the almighty God intends to destroy them.—Some have imagined these three mystical frogs, to be the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Jesuits; and the description given of them would agree well enough with the character of those Janizaries of the church of Rome: but the predicted events must fall much later than the founding of those orders; and Satan will no doubt be able to excite men of the same stamp, for similar services with those performed by them in former ages.—These will be times of great temptation; and therefore Christ, by his apostle, called on his professed servants, to expect his sudden coming, and "to watch," that they might retain and be found in the garments of salvation, and not "walk naked" and so be put to shame, as apostates or hypocrites: for the blessing would belong only to the watchful. This parenthesis interrupts the prediction; which proceeds to show, that He, even the Lord, gathered together the kings of the earth, in his righteous providence, to a place called Armageddon, or the mountain of destruction, with reference to Megiddo. (Judg. 5:19. 2 Kings 23:29,30. Note, Joel 3:9—17.)—The coincidence between this prophecy, and those referred to in the notes, as unfulfilled prophecies in the Old Testament is worthy of special notice; by all, who would patiently investigate the true meaning of them, and not run away with hasty and crude and partial, though plausible interpretations, grounded on incidental resemblances.—False prophet. (14) The same as the second or two-horned beast. (Note, 13:11,12.)

V. 17—21. Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air," (Note, Eph. 2:1,2.) and this last vial will be poured into the very seat of his empire: for after it, his cause in every place, without, as well as within, the dominions of the beast, will be finally ruined. A proclamation was therefore made from "the temple of heaven, ... saying, It is done," or finished; for "under the seventh trumpet the mystery of God was to be finished." (Note, 10:5—7.) Terrible calamities, awful displays of the divine presence; intestine distractions, and the revolt or destruction of cities and nations, &c. will make way for "great Babylon to drink of the wine of the fierceness of God's wrath." (Notes, 14:8—11. 18: Jer. 25:26. 51:7—9.) The concurrent judgments are here described in most energetic language; especially, by hailstones of above a hundred pounds weight each, which must dash in pieces all persons and things whatever, on which they fall. How this is to be understood, the event must show. (Note, 11:15—18.)—It would be very easy to give an opinion, or to quote from those who have done this; but the author would refer the reader to those, who have purposely written on the subject. It is however clear, beyond doubt, that convulsions, revolutions and the wreck of nations, to a degree and extent never hitherto witnessed or recorded, are yet to be expected, before "the mystery of God is finished."—The opinion also, that the land of Canaan will be the stage, on which the last grand conflict shall be decided, is highly probable: (Notes, 20:7—10. Ez. 38:9—23. Dan. 11:40—45.) but whether that country, or the papal dominions, be meant, by the thousand and six hundred furlongs to be drenched with blood, must be left undecided. (Note, 14:14—20.) The dimensions may suit either one or the other: and it is not certain, whether particular dreadful judgments, on the immediate seat of the beast, or tremendous vengeance on all his remaining adherents, be there foretold.—It may be observed, by some readers, that I have not at all noticed the interpretations of those, who consider several of the vials as long since poured out. This has resulted from a full conviction, that these interpretations are absolutely inconsistent with the chronology of the prophecy, and the whole clue which must direct us in expounding it; and that they are altogether unsatisfactory, even as insulated accommodations. The opinion of those, who explain the former of the vials of recent events, which have occurred within these last twenty years, whether well grounded or not, may be allowed to be consistent with the chronology of the book, and with these vials, containing a prediction of "the last plagues." (Notes, 15:1—4.) The grand question to be decided, in this respect, relates to the sounding of the seventh trumpet. If that event be past, the vials have begun to be poured out: if it be future, none of them have been poured out. For it seems to me clear, that as the seventh seal includes all the seven trumpets; so the seventh trumpet includes all the seven vials. Nor do I think it possible for human sagacity to determine, till some considerable time has elapsed, at what precise period events of such immense magnitude, as those here predicted, began to be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How infatuated must men be, to set at defiance the power of God, who can fight against them by such varied means, and with such irresistible weapons! especially as he continues to beseech his enemies to be reconciled to him, and to share his omnipotent and everlasting favour! No wonder that angels, who witness or execute his vengeance on the implacable haters of God, of Christ, and of holiness, loudly celebrate the praises of his justice and truth: and adore his awful dispensations, when he brings upon bloody persecutors the tortures, which they had inflicted on his saints and prophets. But "the heart" of man is so "desperately wicked," that the most complicated miseries will never induce any one to repent, without the special preventing grace of God; nay, if men are left to themselves, they will "blaspheme the name of God," even in the intervals of "gnawing their tongues with pain!" It is vain, therefore, to expect that purgatory, or hell-fire, will ever bring men to glorify God in true repentance, or in any sense purge away their sins. Hell itself is filled with blasphemies, determined and horrid, in proportion to the degree of its torments: and they are as ignorant of the history of human nature, as of the Bible and of their own hearts, who do not know, that the more men suffer, and the more plainly they see the hand of God in their sufferings, the more furiously they often rage against him. Let then sinners now seek repentance from Christ, and the grace of the Holy Spirit; or they will hereafter have the anguish and horror of an unhumbled, impenitent, and desperate heart, burning with enmity against God, as well as tortured by the fire of his indignation; and thus augmenting guilt and misery to all eternity.—While Satan and wicked men, by every artifice, and with all their power, excite numbers to [illegible] against the cause of God; they are in fact gathered by him, that he may execute judgment upon them. (Notes, Ez. 38: 10,16,17. Joel 3:9—17.) But many of those, who are professedly the friends of God, will have their portion with avowed unbelievers; and, being found destitute of the robes of righteousness and salvation, will walk naked, be put to shame, and perish. NOTES.—CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. This chapter contains a digression from the main subject, and a kind of parenthesis in the course of the prophecy; to show more precisely what was meant by "great Babylon," the ruin of which had been so tremendously predicted. (Note, 16:17—21.) One of the angels, who poured out the vials, conversed in vision with John: and called him to come to him, and he would show him the judgment of that antichristian power, secular and ecclesiastical, which might be emphatically called, "the great whore;" because it had exceeded all other churches, or societies and empires, in seducing men to commit idolatry, and abominations of every kind. "The many waters," on which this dignified harlot, who was illustrious in her infamy, sat enthroned as a queen, are afterwards explained. (Note, 15—18. Jer. 51:13.) No one can doubt, but Rome is meant in this chapter; nay, the most zealous papists allow it: and indeed, it would not have been made so undeniable by being expressly named, as it is by this description.—The only question then is, whether Rome Pagan, or Rome Papal is meant. But Pagan Rome never seduced the kings of the earth to join in her idolatries; she never intoxicated the inhabitants "with the wine of her fornication;" she subdued and ruled them with an iron rod, and not by artifices and blandishments; she left them in general to their ancient usages and worship; nay, she imported the idols and vices of the conquered nations, and thus became fatally corrupted. Even when the Roman emperors persecuted the Christians, they did it rather from a desire of crushing innovations, which threatened, as they supposed, the peace of the state, connected with enmity against God, and truth, and holiness, than from zeal for any particular form of idolatry. On the other hand, it is well known, by what subtle insinuations, and politic management, "with all the deceivableness of unrighteousness," Rome Papal, without any adequate temporal force, has obtained and preserved an ascendency over kings and nations; attaching them to her usurped dominion in blind submission, and inducing them to conform to her idolatries, and corruptions of Christianity. So that the authority of powerful kings, and the forces of mighty nations, have repeatedly been employed in defence of her tyranny: and multitudes have been intoxicated, and infuriated, by their zeal for that church, to murder their unoffending neighbours, by tens of thousands; and at the same time to enslave, weaken, and impoverish themselves! (Notes, 9—14. 14:8. 18:1—3. Jer. 51:7.)

V. 3—5. The angel then carried John, "in the Spirit," (that is, being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he seemed to himself to be conveyed,) "into the wilderness;" for the antichristian tyranny and seductions had reduced the church into a most desolate state, and made it like a desert. (Notes, 12:13—17.) There he saw "a woman seated on a scarlet-coloured beast." This "woman" was the emblem of the church of Rome, and "the beast" was the emblem of the temporal power, by which it has been supported; and the latter was "full of names of blasphemy," which we have had repeated occasions to mention. (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—7. 2 Thes. 2:3,4.) "The seven heads and ten horns" are afterwards explained. (Notes, 7—14. 12:3—6. 13:1.) The woman was "arrayed in purple and scarlet-colour:" for these have always been the distinguishing colours of popes and cardinals, as well as of the Roman emperors and senators: nay, by a kind of infatuation, the mules and horses on which they rode, have been covered with scarlet cloth; as if they were determined to answer this description, and even literally to ride on a scarlet-coloured beast!—"The woman" was also most superbly decorated with gold and jewels: and who can, in adequate language, describe the pride, splendour, and magnificence of the church of Rome, in her vestments and ornaments of every kind? Even papists have gloried in the superiority of their church in this species of magnificence, above ancient Rome when at the height of her prosperity. This appears in all things relating to their public worship, and in the Papal court, even beyond what can be conceived and external pomp attaches carnal men to a religion, which excessively interests and gratifies them, and may even be said to intoxicate them; whilst they despise the simplicity of spiritual worship.—'This is beyond description, and as much surpassed my expectation, as other sights have generally fallen short of it. Silver can scarce find an admittance; and gold itself looks put poorly among such an incredible number of precious stones.' Addison.—In the woman's hand like wise there "was a golden cup full of abominations:" this alludes to the practice of harlots, in inflaming their paramours with love potions; and represents the various fascinating allurements, the impostures, delusions, promises of impunity, indulgences, absolutions, with hopes of worldly interest and preferment, by which that church has always obtained and preserved her influence; and seduced men to join in her spiritual fornication, the other abominations of her corrupt worship, and the unholiness connected with it. (Notes, 18: 4—8. 19:1—6.)—To distinguish this notorious harlot from all others, her name was inscribed on her forehead; as prostitutes of old sometimes made themselves known, by labels on the forehead with their names upon them. This name was "Mystery, Babylon the Great." Her religion was "a mystery of iniquity," (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:5—7. 1 Tim. 3:16.) and she herself was mystically "Babylon the Great."—Now there was nothing in Pagan Rome, to which this title was more proper, than to any other city; nor would it have been any thing very mysterious to have substituted one Pagan city for another: but it was indeed a "great mystery," that the professed metropolis of the Christian church should be another Babylon, in idolatry, iniquity, and cruelty to the people of God: and her very title of 'the Roman Catholic, or universal 'church,' entitles her to the name of "Mystery, Babylon the Great." She affects indeed the character of 'our holy mother the church,' but she is in fact, "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth;" the inventor, source, promoter, and principal example, of idolatries, and all kinds of abominable abuses and perversions of Christianity, with which the nations of the earth have been corrupted.—It is asserted by writers of good authority, that before the reformation, the word mystery was written in letters of gold, upon the front of the Pope's mitre; but the fact has been controverted, and therefore, though the affirmative evidence vastly preponderates, we cannot be absolutely certain of it.

V. 6. The woman was as notorious for cruelty and persecution, as for idolatry and profligacy; and the apostle saw her "drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus." (Notes, 16:3—7. 18:20. Dan. 7:19—27.) In this respect Rome Pagan and Rome Papal were both criminal; but the latter has probably slain more thousands than the former did individuals: and the apostle would not have been greatly astonished to see a heathen city persecuting Christians, having witnessed and experienced such persecutions during many years, before he had this vision; but that a city, professedly Christian, and the metropolis of the Christian church, should thus wanton and riot in the blood of the saints, might well excite his highest amazement. 'All this is very plain: but papists wonder by what figure of speech heretics are called "saints," and rebels against the Pope, "martyrs of Jesus."' Bp. Hurd. (Note, John 16:1—3.)

V. 7, 8. Lest any one should mistake or hesitate concerning the meaning of these emblems, the angel became the interpreter of the vision. As the apostle had seen and heard very much on the same subject before, the angel inquired into the reason of his excessive amazement: (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—17.) and he then showed to him "the mystery of the woman, riding on the beast." A beast is the emblem of an idolatrous and oppressive empire: the Roman empire was "the beast" under the Pagan emperors: it ceased to be so, when it became Christian, with reference to which the angel says, by way of anticipation, "It is not." Yet it would afterwards "ascend out of the abyss:" that is, when the antichristian empire became idolatrous and persecuting, and the dragon gave his power to the beast, it seemed to arise out of the sea, the tempestuous state of the nations; but it was in fact from hell, being Satan's grand scheme for opposing the gospel; (Notes, 9:1,2. 11:7—12. 13:1—4.) and therefore after a time it would go into perdition, and be destroyed finally and for ever.—'The empire was idolatrous under the heathen emperors; and then ceased to be so under the Christian emperors; and then became idolatrous again under the Roman pontiffs; and hath so continued ever since.—But in this last form it shall go into perdition: it shall not, as it did before, cease for a time, and revive again, but shall be destroyed for ever.' Bp. Newton. (Note, Dan. 7:9—14,23—27. 11:44,45.) In the mean while, however, it is foretold, it would deceive into a stupid admiration and blind submission, "all the inhabitants of the earth," within the sphere of its influence, except the remnant of the elect. (Note, 13:8—10.)

Shall ascend. (8) Μελλει αναβαινειν. Is about to ascend. This determines the rise of the beast to a period subsequent to the prediction being delivered; and consequently Rome Pagan cannot be meant, for that had risen long before.

V. 9—14. Here then was a proper trial and exercise of a man's "wisdom," to discover what was meant by the beast, which "had been, was not, and yet was;" being the same but in a different form. (Notes, 7,8. 13:18.)—To assist the reader in this inquiry, the angel observed, that "the seven heads" of this symbolical beast "are," or represent, "seven mountains," on which the woman was enthroned; being especially the seat of that ecclesiastical authority, by which the power of the beast is supported. (Notes, 13:1.) This is the well-known situation of Rome: and though Constantinople is also built on seven hills, they are comparatively obscure, and no other mark of the beast answers to it. For "the seven heads" of the beast had another enigmatical meaning, and signified seven "kings," or seven forms of government, or successions of rulers, according to the usual prophetical meaning of the word "kings." They all appeared in vision at once upon the beast; but in fact five of them were fallen, at the time when the apostle had the vision; namely kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes; one of them then subsisted, even that of emperors; and another was not yet come, which when it came would endure only for a short time. Some explain this of the Christian emperors; but their power must either be included in the sixth head; or it could not be a head of the beast at all, not being idolatrous. Others explain it of the Exarch of Ravenna, the deputy of the emperor of the east, under which government this proud city, Rome, continued as a dukedom for above a hundred years. Others explain it of the usurpations of the Pope, before he became a temporal prince, or the prescribed "twelve hundred and sixty years" of the reign of the beast had entered: but that of the Exarch of Ravenna seems most clear. Many other interpretations have been given, and especially the dominion of Charlemagne and his successors, during several generations, has been fixed upon. In general, however, it related to the intervening space between the subversion of the empire, and the establishment of papal tyranny: during which time Rome was under the temporal jurisdiction of the Exarch of Ravenna, and the spiritual rule of the Pope; who had already introduced the worship of saints and images, and many other gross abuses. If this be reckoned a distinct form of government; then the beast, as it subsisted when the woman sat on it, was "the eighth," but if it is deemed too inconsiderable to be reckoned a distinct head, "He was one of the seven;" but whether the seventh or the eighth, he would be the last form of government in that idolatrous empire; and "goeth into perdition." 'The beast, therefore, on which the woman rideth, is the Roman government in its last form: and this, all must acknowledge, is papal, not imperial." Bp. Newton. For the last head was the only one which existed when the woman sat on the beast, and was therefore spoken of as the beast itself.—"The ten horns" (which seem to have all grown on the last head,) were "ten kings," or successions of kings: who had "received no kingdom" when John had this vision: but they would "receive power as kings one hour with the beast," or at the same time, and for the same period. This points out the division of the Roman empire into ten distinct kingdoms, yet all united in one design to support the idolatry of the church of Rome; and it is wholly incompatible with Pagan Rome. They might be kings: but they were not horns of the beast, till they embraced that religion, and both strengthened the hands of the pope and church of Rome, and were strengthened by them. These were contemporary, not successive princes, as the seven kings before mentioned were: and, notwithstanding the continual interference of their several political interests and measures, and their contests in other things, they were "of one mind to give their power to the beast:" implicitly submitting to that idolatrous religion; defending its tyranny and usurpations; enduring its exorbitant exactions; and obeying its mandates to make war, in opposing the cause of Christ, and in order to extirpate his disciples. But it was predicted, that they would all be finally defeated in that war, by "the Lamb of God;" as he is "Lord of lords, and King of kings," as many vain mortals have affected to call themselves: (Notes, 1 Kings 20:1. Ezra 7:12. Dan. 2:37.) and his followers are effectually called to enlist under his standard, in consequence of his special choice of them; and therefore they are true believers, faithful to his cause, and to their own engagements. (Notes, 19:11—21. Matt. 22:11—14.)—Ten kings. (12) Notes, Dan. 2:40—45. 7:7,8.—King of kings. (14) Notes, Ps. 72:8—11. Prov. 8:15,16. 1 Tim. 6:13—16.

V. 15—18. The angel next explained to the apostle "the many waters, on which the woman sat" in regal dignity. Four distinct words, all in the plural number, aptly describe the extensive dominion of the church of Rome, not only over those within the territories belonging to the papacy, but over all the kingdoms of that communion: and in their remote dependencies, in the East Indies, in South America, and other places. Indeed the pope has claimed the right over all nations, to dispose of crowns, and depose princes, at his pleasure, as if he were "lord of lords, and king of kings!" and the very titles of 'universal bishop,' and 'the Roman catholic church,' fully accord to this description. This, however, will not always be the case; for the "ten horns," or kingdoms, which once exalted and supported the ecclesiastical tyrrany, will at length "hate, desolate," strip, devour, and destroy it. Most of them will be the principal instruments in the destruction of popery, and the ruin of Rome itself; though some will lament over these events. (Note, 18:9,10.)—How far some late revolutions may lead to this crisis, we cannot tell: but present appearances render it not improbable, that the last victory of the beast over the witnesses of Christ, will be obtained in some other way, than directly by papal delusions. Yet these appearances are continually changing.—(Note, 11:7—12.)—God had so influenced the hearts of these kings, by his power over them, and by the dispensations of his Providence; that they fulfilled his will, or did those things, without intending it, which he had purposed and predicted. (Notes, Ezra 1:1—4. Ps. 105:23—25. Ez. 14:9—11. 38:10. 2 Thes. 2:10—12.) Thus they had agreed together to "give their kingdom to the beast;" to make him, as it were, their liege lord; and to reign over others, only in order to render them subservient to him. But they will at length better understand their own interest, and their duty to God and their subjects, than thus any longer to prostitute their power.—To terminate the description of the woman, who sat on this symbolical beast, she was declared to be "that great city, which reigned over the kings of the earth," when John had this vision: and every body must know Rome to be that city. Indeed, this was the avowed object, aim, and ambition of Rome, from its foundation; and in different ways, it has accomplished its purpose, with little interruption, even to this present time.—Eat her flesh. (16) Notes, Job 31:29—32. Ps. 27:1—3. Dan. 7:5.—Burn her.] The punishment of a priest's daughter, who committed whoredom. CHAPTER XVIII.

A mighty angel announces the fall of Babylon, and its utter desolation, because of its abominations, 1—3. A voice from heaven calls on the people of God to come out of her, lest they should be involved in her destruction, 4—8. The kings and merchants connected with her lament her fall, 9—19; and the apostles and prophets are called to rejoice over it, 20. Her final and total overthrow first signified by a millstone cast into the sea; and then is emphatically described, 21—24.

AND after these things [s]I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; [t]and the earth was lightened with his glory.

2 And he [c]cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, [d]Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is [e]become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird.

3 For [f]all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and [g]the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the [h]abundance of [h]her delicacies.

4 And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, [i]Come out of her, my people, that ye be not [k]partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of [l]her plagues:

5 For her sins have [l]reached unto heaven, [m]and God hath remembered her iniquities.

6 [n]Reward her even as she rewarded you, and [o]double unto her double according to her works: in [p]the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double.

7 How [q]much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her; for she saith in her heart, [r]I sit a queen, and am [s]no widow, and shall see no sorrow.

8 Therefore [t]shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, [u]and she shall

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord takes pleasure in satisfying his people concerning the reasons and equity of his judgments on his enemies; that they may not be intimidated by the severity of them, or fail to adore and praise him on that account.—Great prosperity, pomp, and splendour, commonly feed the pride and lusts of the human heart; yet they form no security against divine vengeance.—Those who allure or tempt others to sin, must expect more aggravated punishment, in proportion to the degree of the mischief done by them.—The worst abominations, idolatries, filthinesses, cruelties, and blasphemies, have been perpetrated within the professing church: and a magnificent religion, adorned with purple, and decked with gold and jewels, is generally antichristian. Indeed, every attempt to accommodate the truth or worship of God to the taste of carnal minds, must mar its simplicity, and corrupt its purity. But "the golden image," or "golden cup," in the hand of Babylon and her daughters, will reconcile most men to "the mysteries of iniquity" connected with it; and make them willingly swallow down the wine of their fornications: and even induce them to join in making themselves "drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus." (Notes, Dan. 3:1—12.) Let all then beware of a splendid, a lucrative, or a fashionable religion: let us avoid "the mysteries of iniquity," and study diligently "the great Mystery of godliness;" that we may learn humility, simplicity, self-denial, and gratitude, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth, by the side of the well at Sychar, in the garden of Gethsemane, and on mount Golgotha; for the more we resemble Christ, the less shall we be liable to be deceived by antichrist.—We cannot but "wonder" at the oceans, as it were, of Christian blood, which have been shed by men called Christians: but our wonder will abate, when we consider these prophecies; and the awful fact "will turn to us for a testimony" of the truth of the gospel. Whatever enemies at any time "make war against the Lamb" of God, they must surely be overcome by him. "Though hand join in hand," such wicked men "shall not be unpunished;" even if all the kings and nations of the earth should agree in opposing him: for he is "Lord of lords, and King of kings;" and his "called, chosen, and faithful" followers are always on the strongest side. May we approve ourselves to be of that number! And then we shall be "received to his glory," when wicked men will be destroyed in a most tremendous manner; and when their concurrence together in sin will be turned into the bitterest hatred and rage, and they will eagerly assist in tormenting each other. But "The LORD's Portion is his people;" "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and no counsel or machination of men or creatures can do more than fulfil his words, and that "purpose which he has purposed in himself," "to the praise of his glory," and to the everlasting felicity of all his chosen and faithful servants.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—3. (Note, 16:17—21.) After the apostle had been certified who "Babylon the great" was, and what she had done, he had the vision of her destruction continued. "Another angel," distinct from those who "poured out the vials," came down from heaven, possessing great power, and illuminating the earth with his glory. This was either Christ himself, or an emblematical representation of his coming to destroy his enemies, and to diffuse the light of his gospel through all nations; to which events the language naturally directs our thoughts. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) He therefore repeatedly proclaimed "with a strong voice," which all might hear, and which implied great power and authority, that "Babylon the great is fallen," totally and finally. (Notes, 14:8. Is. 21:6—9.) It was become not only desolate, but a kind of hell upon earth. Some think, that the words may refer to the discoveries which will then be made, of the diabolical ambition, impostures, lies, murder, and horrible uncleanness, with which the city is filled, under the mask of religion; but the expressions are figurative and borrowed from the Old Testament. (Notes, Is. 13:19—22. 34:9—17. Jer. 51:61—64.) It is most manifest, that no desolations have hitherto left Rome in this condition; unless any choose to say, that it "hath been the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird," ever since popes and cardinals have made it their residence: for, unless this be admitted, it must be manifest to all men, that the prophecy is not yet fulfilled.—To the reasons before assigned for the ruin of this city, it is here added, that "the merchants of the earth are waxed rich, through the abundance of her delicacies." Her outward magnificence, luxury, and excess, have proved a source of immense wealth to vast multitudes; and the various arts, trades, manufactures, and species of commerce, which flourish by means of her pompous religion, have always helped to support it: for "by that craft vast multitudes have their wealth." Painting, sculpture, architecture, music, and all the fine arts, have also met with the most ample encouragement, and been cultivated in the greatest perfection, in that splendid church. (Notes, 18:3—5. Acts 19:23—31. P. O. 21—31.) But the spiritual merchandise, by which unnumbered multitudes have wickedly lived in affluence, and enjoyed abundant delicacies, by the sins and follies of mankind, seem principally intended.

V. 4—8. As Lot was called forth out of Sodom, before it was destroyed by fire and brimstone; (Notes, Gen. 19:14—22,27—29.) so the people of God are directed by a voice from heaven, to come out of Babylon before her fall. (Notes, Is. 52:11,12. Jer. 50:7,8. 51:6,7,45,46.) This summons concerns all persons in every age. Those who believe in Christ, and "worship God in the Spirit," should separate from so corrupt a church, and from all others which copy her example of idolatry, persecution, cruelty, and tyranny; and avoid "being partakers of her sins," even if they have renounced her communion: or else they may expect to be involved in her plagues. (Note, 14:9—11.) Her crimes, her daring, presumptuous, and atrocious wickednesses, resembled mountains "reaching to heaven;" and "God had remembered her iniquities," though his forbearance had been mistaken for disregard. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, 16:17—21.) The persons therefore, or nations, who had been persecuted by her, were called on to retaliate upon her as a condemned criminal; and to give her a double measure of the wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation; according to the atrociousness of her sins, and the cruel treatment which they had received at her hands. Thus torture and anguish would be rendered to her, proportionable to her former ostentation, splendour and luxury; and to the pride and presumption, with which she had set these predictions at defiance, declaring that "she sat as a queen, was no" bereaved destitute "widow, and should see no sorrow" whatever the word of God had threatened. (Notes, 20. 6:9—11. 14:8—11. 16:3—7. 19:1—6. Ps. 137:7—9. 149:7,9. Is. 14:1,2,12. 47:7—10. Jer. 51:9,10,34—37.) Therefore all the plagues which had been denounced against her would surely "come on her in one day," suddenly and unexpectedly; death in every dreadful form would fill the city with mourning, and dire famine would attend the other desolations; till she should utterly be burned with fire; (Note, 17:15—18.) and then she would know that the Lord, who had judged and condemned her, was strong, and fully able to execute the tremendous sentence.—As Rome has never hitherto been "utterly burned with fire," it is undeniable that events yet in futurity are predicted.—Be not partakers of her sins. (4) Notes, 1 Tim. 5:21,22. 2 John 7—11.—Double. (6) *Marg. be utterly burned with fire: [x]for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her. [Practical Observations.]

9 And [y]the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, [z]shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see [a]the smoke of her burning,

10 Standing [b]afar off for the fear of her torment, saying, [c]Alas, alas! [d]that great city Babylon, that mighty city! [e]for in one hour is thy judgment come.

11 And [f]the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her; for no man [g]buyeth their merchandise any more:

12 The [h]merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all [i]thyine wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble,

13 And [j]cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, [k]and slaves, [l]and souls of men.

14 And the fruits that [m]thy soul lusted after are [n]departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all.

15 The merchants of these things, [o]which were made rich by her, [p]shall stand afar off, for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing,

16 And saying, [q]Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls!

17 For [r]in one hour so great riches is come to naught. [s]And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off, 18 And cried [t]when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, [u]What city is like unto this great city!

19 And [x]they cast dust on their heads, and cried, [y]weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.

[Practical Observations.]

20 [z]Rejoice over her, thou heaven, [a]and ye holy apostles and prophets; for [b]God hath avenged you on her.

21 And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, [c]Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, [d]and shall be found no more at all.

22 And [e]the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee;

23 And [f]the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; [g]and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: for [h]thy merchants were the great men of the earth; [i]for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived.

24 And [k]in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth.

Lived deliciously. (7) Ἐστρηνιάσε. Note, 1 Tim. 5:9—12.

V. 9, 10. Some of the kings, who had previously supported the church of Rome, will adhere to her, even when the rest of them will unite in destroying her; (Note, 17:15—18.) and they will lament her fall, having been bigoted to her idolatries, and having lived in more abundant and excessive luxury and magnificence, through their alliance with her. They will, therefore, bewail at a distance, beholding "the smoke of her burning" and torment, without being able to quench the one, or relieve the other: so that they must either at length renounce her, or share her doom. (Notes, 11—19. Ez. 28:16—23.) In this situation they will say, "Alas! alas!" Or, "Wo! wo!" for this will be the third wo before mentioned. (Note, 11:13,14.) Not that the fall of Rome will terminate that wo; (though it will end with the pouring out of the seventh vial, and its immediate consequences;) for the events predicted in the following chapter will form a very considerable part of it. Nor is there any satisfactory proof, though it has generally been supposed, that the second wo-trumpet will end in the destruction of the Othman empire. (Note, 9:13—21.) On the contrary, it may perhaps subsist in an enfeebled state, till after the fall of the western antichrist. This may be one grand means of the national conversion of the Jews; and their restoration to their own land may produce the subversion of the Othman empire, the destruction of the Mohammedan delusion, and the calling of the other Gentiles. (Notes, Ez. 38; 39: Dan. 11:40—45.)—We ought not indeed to be confident in such matters; yet the arrangement of this and the two following chapters, seems to favour the supposition: as the destruction of all Christ's implacable enemies, the conversion of the nations, and the binding of Satan, are predicted in order, after the fall of Rome. (Notes, 19: 20:1—3.)

Alas, alas. (10) Οὐαὶ, οὐαὶ. 16, 8:13. 11:14.

V. 11—19. (Notes, 17:3—5. Ez. 26: 27:12—25.) This lamentation of these "merchants," over Rome, coincides in many respects with that of the merchants over Tyre. The various articles of commerce here enumerated do not require a particular consideration: the whole is calculated to convey, in the most impressive manner imaginable, some idea of the splendour, luxury, excess, and self-indulgence of all kinds, which have so long triumphed in the powerful, magnificent, elegant, luxurious, and licentious metropolis of popery; and which have always enriched a vast number of individuals, in different ways, by impoverishing the nations belonging to that communion. Neither is it requisite to accommodate the various particulars, to the several kinds of spiritual merchandise, by which the popes, cardinals, bishops, abbots, priests, and other retainers, have been enriched at the expense of the people. These are indeed evidently alluded to; when not only "slaves," but "the souls of men," are mentioned as articles of commerce; which is, beyond comparison, the most infamous of all traffics that the demon of avarice ever devised; even almost infinitely more atrocious than the infamous slave-trade. Yet, alas, it is very far from uncommon. The sale of indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, masses, and bulls, has always enriched the Romish clergy and their dependents, to the deceiving and destroying of the souls of millions; and thus "by feigned words, they made merchandise of them:" nor has the management of church preferments, and many other things, been any better than trafficking in souls; and it would be highly gratifying to protestants, if we could say, that this merchandise has been peculiar to the Roman antichrist, and exclusively their guilt: and that none among us were "partakers of their sins." (Note, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—12. Note, Matt. 21:12,13. P. O. 12—16.) In general, however, all this will at length come to nothing, and no man will "buy the merchandise" of Rome any more: but all who have shared the gains of her commerce, temporal or spiritual, will stand afar off, for fear of her torment, and "behold the smoke of her burning," as that of Sodom was seen at a distance. (Gen. 19:28. Notes, Deut. 29:20—25. Is. 34:9—15. Dan. 7:9—14.)—Probably, the destruction of Rome will be finished by some immediate judgment of God: and the nature of the soil in the vicinity, the frequent eruptions of subterraneous fires, and terrible earthquakes, which have often occurred, seem to point out the method: the combustibles are provided, and the train is already laid; there only wants the "breath of the Almighty to kindle it." (Note, Is. 30:33.)

V. 20. While united numbers, whose hopes of further gains will be gone, or whose vain confidence in superstition and idolatry will be ruined, shall lament most dolefully, and with anguish and trembling of heart, over the fall of Rome; the inhabitants of "heaven," and especially the "holy apostles and prophets," are called on to rejoice over it: as God had "avenged them" on that idolatrous persecuting city; as well as made way for the preaching of his gospel to all nations. (Notes, 6:9—11. 12:7—12. 16:4—7.)—It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that "the apostles," who are

CHAPTER XIX.

The apostle hears in vision all the servants of God praise him with loud acclamations, 1—6. An intimation is given of the vast success of the gospel, under the emblem of the marriage of the Lamb, 7, 8. An angel declares the blessedness of those, who are called to the marriage-supper, 9. John, about to worship the angel, is reproved, and forbidden, 10. Christ and his followers, on white horses, are seen obtaining great and decisive victories, and utterly destroying all opposers, especially the beast and the false prophet and their adherents, who are cast alive into a lake of fire and brimstone, 11—21.

AND [a]after these things [b]I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, [c]Alleluia; [d]Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God:

idolatrously honoured at Rome, and daily worshipped, should be specially mentioned as rejoicing in her fall; as if it "avenged them" on her, for the dishonour cast on their characters, while it vindicated the glory of God. (Note, 13:5—7.) —There could be no reason why Christains should rejoice in the judgments inflicted on ancient Rome, by the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other idolatrous nations; for the Christians were peculiarly sufferers in those calamities. The judgments on papal Rome must therefore be exclusively intended.

V. 21—24. As a stone was tied to a book, and cast into the Euphrates, by Seraiah, in token of literal Babylon's fall; (Note, Jer. 51:61—64.) so "a mighty angel" here cast a large millstone into the sea, to represent the violence of mystical Babylon's fall, and to show that she would never rise again. This event is further illustrated by varied emphatical expressions taken from the ancient prophets. (Notes, Is. 34:8—15. Jer. 25:10. 33:10,11. Marg. Ref. e—g.)—'But Rome is still standing, and flourishing, and is honoured by many nations, as the metropolis of the Christian world; she still resounds with singers and musicians; she still excels in arts, which serve to pomp and luxury: she still abounds with candles, and lamps, and torches, burning even by day, as well as by night; and consequently this prophecy hath not been, but remains yet to be fulfilled.' Bp. Newton. Her merchants being said to be "the great men of the earth," in connexion with "all nations being deceived by her sorceries," plainly refers to the infamous traffic before mentioned.

No more at all. (21) Ουκετι. 11. Ουκετι ου μη, 14. Ου μη ετι, 22,23. These repeated, varied, and emphatical negatives, should not pass unnoticed. (Notes, Is. 13:18—22. 14:21—23.) Of what other city, literal Babylon alone excepted, is such decisive language used, concerning its absolute and final destruction?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. When collective bodies are ripe for vengeance, their sins will be punished in this world; but individuals are reserved unto "the wrath to come."—Impunity and prosperity in wickedness, constitute the most fatal incentive to further crimes; and, as the day of punishment will arrive, they may be accounted the most dire calamities.—When the Lord shall come in his great power, to "lighten the earth with his glory;" he will cast down the proudest cities, which are filled with iniquity, and oppose his cause. The magnificence of wicked kings and emperors, or the riches of ungodly merchants, will then alike avail nothing; except to augment, and render more intolerable, the vengeance to be inflicted: and surely even the contempt and torment of hell must be more dreadful to those who "have glorified themselves and lived deliciously," than to other sinners!

V. 9—19. No allies or helpers can deliver those, against whom the Lord Gòd, as a strong Judge and Avenger, is pleased to contend: they can only lament the victims of his indignation, and tremble for themselves. (Note, Num. 16:28—34.) The prosperous merchants and traders, in great commercial cities, should learn from these prophecies, "to buy the truth," "to get wisdom," and "with all their getting to get understanding;" to "sell all, and purchase the Pearl of great price;" to ensure "the unsearchable riches of Christ:" and to be "faithful stewards in the unrighteous mammon:" (Notes, Luke 16:1—13.) otherwise, even in this life, they may lament that "no man buyeth their merchandise any more," as recent events most fully show; and that "all the fruits that their souls lusted after are departed from them." Death however will soon terminate their commerce, and in that "one hour" all the riches of the ungodly will come to naught, and all "their purple and fine linen," will be exchanged, not only for the coffin and the worm, but for "the fire that never shall be quenched." (Notes, Luke 16:19—31.)—Alas! too often, injustice, oppression, fraud, avarice, or excessive indulgence, are connected with extensive commerce: and to number "the persons of men," with oxen, asses, sheep, and horses, as the stock of a farm, or with bales of goods, as the cargo of a ship, is no doubt a most detestable and antichristian practice, fit only for "Babylon the Great." Yet even this, cruel, unrighteous, and hateful as it is, must not be considered as the worst traffic, even of this our land: for the souls of men are traded for by those, who take the cure of them for the sake of the emolument, and the abundance of the delicacies obtained for he hath [f]judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, [g]and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand.

3 And again they said, [h]Alleluia. And her smoke rose up for ever and ever.

4 And [k]the four and twenty elders, and the four beasts, fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying, [l]Amen; [m]Alleluia.

5 And [n]a voice came out of the throne, saying, [o]Praise our God, all ye his servants and ye that fear him, [p]both small and great.

6 And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great

by it; and then either leave them to perish in ignorance, or poison them by heresy, or lead them on the road to hell by a profligate example: strenuously, and by every calumny, if stronger means are withheld, opposing all, who attempt to prevent the dire effects of their vile conduct. How fervently should we then pray, that God would 'illuminate all bishops, priests, and deacons, with the true knowledge and understanding of his word,' and raise up rulers and reformers, who may contend as firmly, perseveringly, and successfully, against this vile merchandise, as some truly honourable and philanthropical persons have done against the accursed slave-trade! For when Christ shall again come to "drive the buyers and sellers out of the temple," he will have much to do, in various other places besides Rome. Many of these spiritual wickednesses, and this merchandise of souls, by feigned words, equivocating subscriptions and declarations, nay, worshipping God in expressions, which are avowedly deemed false by those who use them, and all this "for filthy lucre's sake," will be found, under different forms, even in the protestant churches: and perhaps no denomination is quite free from the guilt of rendering religious profession, and sacred functions, subservient to worldly interest, credit, ease, and indulgence. These are the remains of the antichristianity derived from Rome, which most need protesting against and removing; in these things we ought to "come out and separate from Babylon," if we would not partake of her plagues. Compared with such evils, a posture, a garb, or a ceremony, though perhaps inconvenient in itself, and derived from Rome, is scarcely worth noticing: yet bigotry exerts itself principally the other way; and externals are decried against with great warmth, while the spiritual pride, avarice, worldly indulgence, and intolerance of Rome are not so much disliked! But the vengeance of heaven is coming upon Rome, not for gestures, garbs, and ceremonies, though multiplied, ridiculous, and of bad consequence in themselves; but for idolatry, ambition, oppression, cruelty to the people of God; imposture, avarice, licentiousness, and spiritual tyranny. These are the sins, which have "reached to the heavens," the iniquities that God remembers; and the evils, for which we must stand aloof from her communion, and that of all others, who resemble her, or we shall be involved in their destruction. But we must needs go out of the world, and the church too, if we renounce every religious society, because some of the members or leaders of it are criminal in such matters.

V. 20—24. When the world rejoices, the disciples of Christ often mourn; but they are called to "rejoice" when the world is filled with lamentation. (Note, John 16:16—22.) It is of comparatively little consequence, what becomes of all the riches, magnificence, and costliness of the earth; if the Redeemer's kingdom be but promoted, and his enemies either converted, or deprived of the power to do mischief. "Apostles and prophets rejoice in heaven" on such occasions, and we ought to rejoice on earth; even though they be connected with the fall of mighty cities and empires, to "rise no more for ever." But let sinners take warning by the judgments executed on others, to tremble and "flee from the wrath to come," and to stand at a distance from those things, which have brought others to destruction: (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) and let us all take occasion, from the view given us of the changeable nature of earthly things, to "set our affections on things above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XIX. V. 1—6. When the apostle had witnessed the destruction of mystical Babylon, (Notes, 18:20—24.) he heard "the loud voice of much people in heaven," singing the praises of God in exalted strains; ascribing to him their own salvation and that of his church; and adoring his glorious perfections, as displayed in these events, and in all his wonderful works, and his sovereign and everlasting dominion. (Note, 7:9—12.) For his truth and justice had been made alike conspicuous, in the judgments which had been executed on that corrupt and persecuting church and city. (Notes, 15:1—4. 16:3—7.) And again they cried Alleluia, or "Praise the LORD;" while the smoke of the city arose up perpetually, and was an emblem of the final and eternal misery of the wicked inhabitants, who had been cut off in their sins. (Note, 14:9—11.) In these praises, the emblematical representatives of the church, and her minismultitude, [q]and as the voice of many waters, [r]and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia: [s]for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

7 Let us [t]be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: [u]for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.

8 And [x]to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and [y]white: for [z]the fine linen is the righteousness of saints.

9 And he saith unto me, [a]Write, [b]Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage-supper of the Lamb. And he saith unto me, [c]These are the true sayings of God.

10 And [d]I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, [e]See thou do it not: [f]I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have [g]the testimony of Jesus: [h]worship God: [i]for the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy.

ters, most cordially united: (Note, 4:4—8.) and a voice from the throne of God, or from some one who was very near it, called on all the servants of God in heaven and earth, great and small, even all his worshippers, all who feared God without distinction, to praise him. (Notes, Ps. 118:1—4. 135: 15—21.) This was followed by the acclamations of a multitude, like the rushing of a cataract, or the roaring of the sea, nay, of mighty thunders; who joined in praising the Lord, because by his omnipotence he had taken the throne, and would reign in and by his Son all over the earth. (Notes, 5: 8—14. 11:15—18. 14:1—5. Ps. 96: 97:1. 98:)—The repeated use of the word "Alleluia," or Hallelujah, which is Hebrew, (Notes, Ps. 106:1. 149:) is supposed by some persons to be an intimation that the Jews will be converted about the time of the destruction of Rome: and, whatever may be thought of this, it is exceedingly probable that the accomplishment of the New Testament prophecies, in this respect, will be one principal means of effecting that happy change, if it have not previously taken place.

V. 7, 8. The whole company, before mentioned, next call on one another, "to rejoice, and give glory to" the Lord; "because the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." Christ is the Bridegroom of his ransomed church: this sacred union will be fully completed in heaven; but the beginning of the glorious Millennium may be considered as a remarkable celebration of his espousals on earth. (Notes, 21:1—4,9—21. Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 1:2. 3: 11. John 3:27—36. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27.) All that has hitherto been done seems to be merely an introduction to that happy era; when innumerable multitudes will be converted all over the earth, and the state of the church will greatly resemble heaven itself. Then "the marriage of the Lamb" will come; and his espoused church, being purified from heresies, divisions, and antichristian corruptions, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice, will be "made ready," and meet to be publicly owned by him, as his delight and his beloved. Then to her it will be granted to "be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white," or pure and shining, "which is the righteousness of the saints." The word is plural, and some would render it, "the righteous acts of the saints;" but the word raiment, in this meaning, seems generally to signify, either the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, or the image of Christ renewed in them, by the sanctification of the Spirit, of which their righteous acts are effects and evidences: and indeed both senses may here be intended. (Notes, 7:13—17. Rom. 13:11—14. Gal. 3:26—29.)—"That is, those good works, which are the certain evidences of a living faith." Beza.

Righteousness. (8) Δικαιωματα. Luke 1:6. Rom. 5:16,18. 8:4.

V. 9, 10. An angel, either he from whom the voice is supposed to have come, (5) or rather the angel who interpreted the foregoing vision, (17:7.) informed the apostle on this occasion, that those persons would be happy, in a peculiar manner and degree, who were "invited to the marriage-supper of the Lamb." (Notes, Matt. 22:1—14. Luke 14:15 —24.) This seems especially to refer to the more abundant grace and consolation, that Christians will receive in those happy days which are coming. This will render their lives on earth far more blessed than ours are at present, and make them meet for a more exalted felicity in heaven.—The church collectively is the spouse of Christ: believers are often individually spoken of as invited guests to the marriage-feast; which may relate both to their present joy in the Lord, and to the perfect happiness of heaven. The angel further assured John, that "these were the true sayings of God;" thus attesting the whole of the prophecies and promises. Upon which the glorious presence of the angel, and the rapturous prospect of the approaching happy times, threw the apostle's mind into such an agitation, that he fell prostrate before the angel to "worship him." But the angel charged him by no means to do it: as he was not his Creator, or Lord, or in any respect an object of adoration; but a fellow-servant to him, and to his brethren, who had been employed to bear testimony to the Lord Jesus. And he ought to "worship God," and not a creature and a servant: for he (the angel) was only a prophet of superior order, being inspired by the Spirit to bear testimony to Jesus, as the common Lord of men and angels. Indeed, "the testimony of Jesus" was, from the beginning, the great subject of "the Spirit of prophecy," to whomsoever he was given; as also the revelations and predictions of Scripture were intended to make the Saviour known, in his personal and mediatorial glory, to make way for his coming, to announce it, to lead the attention of men to him, or to prove the doctrines revealed concerning him.—'Thither, as to that one and certain scope, or object, all the prophecies tend: whence it is effected, that, at last, the true Spirit of prophecy, to which we must hearken, is that which leads us unto Jesus.' Beza. (Notes, Luke 24:25—35,44—49. John 5:39—47. 16:14,15.)—Christ never declined such honour as John was forbidden to render to the angel, nay, he always showed his approbation of it: but the angel was a servant, and no more: Jesus is "the King of glory," and "the Lord of all," "God blessed for evermore." (Notes, 22:8,9. Matt. 14:33. 15:25—28. Acts 10:24—26.)—It should also especially be remembered, that the worship of creatures, or demons, under the names of saints and angels, forms the most prominent part of that corruption of Christianity by idolatry, which has extended its baleful influence through so many populous nations, and continued during so many revolving ages; and against which the apostle was, in this book, required to bear a most decided prophetical testimony. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Now, nothing could give more energy to this protest, than the repeated injunction laid on him, not to pay any homage at all resembling adoration, to a most glorious benevolent angel, when visibly present, and acting the part of an instructer to him. Surely then, no invisible, and (as far as we can know) absent creatures, can be worshipped, without giving to them the glory which belongs exclusively to JEHOVAH. (Note, Ex. 20:3.)

V. 11—16. Having noted the rejoicing of the universal church, and of "all the servants of God," over the destruction of Rome; the apostle "saw heaven opened," as an indication of further visions: and he beheld "a white horse," the emblem of justice and holiness; and One sat on it, who was "called Faithful and True," fulfilling his promises to his people, and executing threatened vengeance on his enemies. (Note, 6:1,2.) He was indeed about to "judge, and to wage war" against, those who refused submission to him: yet he was unlike those warriors, whose ambition, rapacity, or malignant passions, have in every age made the earth a "field of blood;" for he conducted both his judicial proceedings, and his military expeditions, by the most perfect rules of righteousness. (Notes, Ps. 45:6,7. Heb. 7:1—3.) Yet none could deceive him, or elude his detection, for "his eyes were as a flame of fire." (1:14.)—The "many crowns," worn by him denoted the extent of his authority, as Creator of the world, and "Head over all things to his church;" and the multitude of his victories. "He had a name written that no man knew but himself;" for, as the eternal Son of God, his perfections and nature are incomprehensible. (Notes, 2:17. Judg. 13:18—22. Is. 9:6,7. Matt. 11:27.) His "vesture, dipped in blood," implied, either the atonement of his own blood, as the ground of his mediatorial authority; or rather, that he was come from the slaughter of his enemies, and had stained his garments with their blood. (Notes, Is. 63:1—6.) But, though none could fully comprehend his perfections and counsels; yet he was known in his church by the name of "the Word of God," as declaring the mysterious perfections, and holy truth and will of God to fallen men. (Note, John 1:1—3.) He was also followed by "the armies of heaven" even his redeemed and converted people, who rode on "white horses," to denote their conformity to him, and their concurrence and agency in his victories. (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) These were "clothed in fine linen," (Note, 7,8.) as accepted in him, and renewed by him. To illustrate the nature of his conquests still more fully, "out of his mouth went a sharp sword," (1:16. Notes, Is. 11:2—5. Heb. 4:12,13.) implying that he powerfully executed the denunciations of his word, and smote the opposing nations. (Notes, 2:24—28. Ps. 2:7—12.) Thus "he trod the wine-press of the wrath of God;" (Note, 14:14—20.) crushing all other obstinate enemies, as he had done the mystical Babylon. He had also inscribed "on his vesture, and on his thigh," (the part of his garments where the sword is worn) another name or title, implying his universal and absolute dominion, as "KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS;" (Note, 17:9—14.) This carried in it a warning to the most powerful princes to submit to him, or they must fall before him.—These verses and the context seem to predict the progress of the gospel, subsequent to the fall of Rome, in the destruction of the remains of the antichristian empire, the purifying of the visible church, the conversion of Jews, and complete restoration of Israel, the termination of Mohammedism, and the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles: and they more fully declare most important transactions, which had been before intimated, and which had been also foretold by the ancient prophets. (Notes, Ps. 139: Is. 11:11—16. 12:34. 49:24—26. 51:21—23. 60: 63:1—6. 66:15—24. Ez. 38: 39: Dan. 2: 44,45. 7:9—14. 8:23—25. 11:40—45. Hos. 3:4,5. Joel 3:9—21. Am. 9:13—15. Ob. 17—21. Mic. 5:7—15. 7:8—17. Zeph. 3: 14—17. Zech. 12:6—14. 14:)

V. 17—21. The "angel standing in the sun" emblematically denoted, that the predicted judgments would be rendered conspicuous to all the world; and his proclamation showed the immense slaughter which would be made of the enemies of God. To this place may be referred Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog; as the subsequent visions seem to relate to the Millennium: (Notes, 20:7—10. Ez. 38:—48:) for the total ruin of the eastern antichrist, and of all the opposers of the gospel in Asia and elsewhere, seems to be intimately connected with the fall of the western antichrist.—Though Rome "the seat of the beast" was destroyed, yet "the beast" himself is supposed still to subsist: for the spirit of antichrist will survive that antichristian city. Probably the adherents of the party will unite with other enemies of genuine Christianity, in different parts of the world: and "the woman," who was the emblem of Rome, which was to be destroyed, was not "the beast," but "sat upon the beast." (Notes, 13:1—10. 17:3—8,15—18.) "The beast," or the idolatrous persecuting power, whose chief seat had been at Rome, will form a confederacy with "the kings of the earth," that, with combined forces, they may fight against Christ and his servants: but, in the event the antichristian tyranny, and the corrupt clergy, who deceived men by lying miracles to support it, will be seized on and dreadfully destroyed; by being "cast alive into the lake of fire burning with brimstone:" and then all the remnant of their adherents will be cut off, according to the words of Christ; so that all opposition to his pure religion will then cease, till after the Millennium.—"The false prophet" evidently denotes the same power, before designated as "the two-horned beast:" and this effectually confirms the interpretation which has been given of that great enemy of God and his church. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. All heaven resounds with the high praises of God, whenever he executes his "true and righteous judgments" on those who corrupt the earth with pernicious principles and ungodly practices, and when he avenges the blood of his servants upon their persecutors. (Notes, Judg. 5:30, 31. Ps. 68:1—3. 149:7—9.) Though "the smoke of their torment shall arise up for ever and ever;" the whole company of redeemed sinners, and all the servants and worshippers of God in heaven and earth, will concur in these acclamations, and say, Amen, Hallelujah. Who then are they, that throw out insinuations or openly speak of cruelty and tyranny, on hearing of these "righteous judgments," but rebels, who blasphemously take part with the enemies of God, and plead against his dealings towards them? Let all beware of every approach to such impiety and presumption; for "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."—As "justice and judgment are the basis of his throne," the earth has cause to tremble; but as it is established in mercy also, the penitent may rejoice in hope. (Notes, Ps. 97:1—7. 99:1—3.) Ten thousand times ten thousand, who once were rebels, are now singing, "Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power be unto the Lord our God." Let us then be glad in him, and give honour to him; and, while we view "the Lamb that was slain," espousing redeemed sinners unto himself; let us remember that we are invited to share the blessedness of "the marriage-supper;" that "the wedding-garment" is given to all who properly seek for it; that now is the time to be made ready for those sacred joys; and that all the felicity, which the world can boast, is not worthy to be compared with this unfading crown of glory and happiness. "These are the true sayings of God;" let none then say, "I pray thee have me excused."—If created angels are so glorious, as to surprise even the aged apostle into a purposed adoration; how glorious must the Lord of Angels be! And if the highest of holy creatures greatly fear, and decidedly refuse, undue honour, how humbly should we sinful worms of the earth behave ourselves! And yet we may and ought to aspire at being made "equal to angels and the children of God," by faith in Christ Jesus. We should then beware of a voluntary humility; and not degrade ourselves, or dishonour our Head, by worshipping angels, or any mere creature; by "calling men masters upon earth," or by the grovelling pursuit of worldly things. (Note, Col. 2:18,19.)—But the blessed Jesus is "the Lord of all;" while angels, apostles, and Christians are fellow-servants: he is "God over all," and therefore to be worshipped as one with the Father and the Holy Spirit; and all Revelation is "the testimony" of the Father, by the Spirit, to the Redeemer's personal and mediatorial glory: the whole centres in him, and in his salvation and kingdom.

V. 11—21. We ought continually to pray, that "the King of kings, and Lord of lords," whose "name is Wonderful," may speedily go forth, in faithfulness and righteousness, to extend his spiritual conquests; till "all kings fall down before him, and all nations do him service!" May his armies be increased in number, and made more like unto him; being "clothed in fine linen, clean and white," which "is the righteousness of saints!"—We cannot indeed know his whole glory, or his immeasurable love; but let us endeavour to be more acquainted with him, as THE WORD OF GOD; and, accepting of his Salvation, may we be glad in him, who is "the King of kings, and Lord of lords!" for he will surely smite his proudest and stoutest enemies "with the rod of his mouth," and, "with the breath of his lips will he slay the wicked;" till he has crushed them all "in the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of almighty God." It behooves us then to rejoice and praise the Lord, when opposing tyrants are crushed, and false prophets are put to silence in darkness; and we should not scruple to add, "So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD." Nevertheless, it is our part to aim at more peaceful and gentle victories; and, by our prayers, example, and improvement of talents, to seek the conversion of sin-

CHAPTER XX.

An angel binds Satan, and imprisons him in the abyss, for a thousand years, 1—3. The glorious state of the church during that period is figuratively described, 4—6. Satan, being loosed, again deceives the nations, and excites terrible war against the church, 7—9; the assailants are destroyed by fire from heaven, and Satan cast into hell, 10. Christ appears to raise the dead, and to judge the world; with the condemnation, and punishment "in the lake of fire," of all, who are not "written in the book of life," 11—15.

ners, and the salvation of the souls even of our most cruel enemies and persecutors; while we constantly declare, that "except they repent, they will all likewise perish."

NOTES.—CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. In the foregoing chapter the termination of all open opposition to the gospel, and the dreadful punishment of all those who had introduced, supported, or concurred in the idolatrous corruptions before described, are most clearly predicted. But, while the instruments of mischief had been cut off, the great agent was still at liberty; and he would surely excite fresh disturbances, or produce new delusions, if not prevented. The apostle had therefore a vision, emblematical of the restraints which would be laid on Satan himself. An angel from heaven, with "the key of the abyss," (Note, 9:1,2.) "and a great chain," seized on him, bound him, and "cast him into the abyss," and there "shut him up, and set a seal upon him;" (Note, Matt. 27:62—66.) to prevent his deceiving the nations, as he had before done: and this imprisonment continued during one thousand years. (Note, 4—6.) In some places "the dragon" signifies the persecuting power of idolatrous emperors, who were vicegerents of the devil, and bare his name and style: (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—4.) but here Satan himself is evidently meant. And it is implied that Christ, with omnipotence and absolute authority, will restrain "the devil and his angels," even all his legions of evil spirits, from deceiving mankind in general or any part of them, into idolatry, impiety, heresy, and wickedness, as he has hitherto done. (Notes, 7—10. 12:7—17.) For though human nature is prone to all evil, and averse to all good; yet the agency and influence of fallen angels have immense effect in counteracting the gospel, in exciting men to atrocious crimes and cruel persecutions, and in devising and propagating ingenious, but fatal delusions. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:13—15. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) When, therefore, this "roaring lion," or subtle poisonous old serpent, shall be completely restrained; the gospel will be rendered effectual, to purify the church and convert the nations; the Christian religion in all its purity and glory will become universal; and the true "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit." Then the first petitions of the Lord's prayer will be wonderfully answered; (Notes, Matt. 6:9,10.) and piety, peace, righteousness, and purity will fill the earth, till Satan shall again for a short space be loosed. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Note, Gen. 3:14,15.)

V. 4—6. The apostle next saw "thrones, and those that sat upon them." These persons, sitting on thrones, represented the honourable and prosperous state of believers in those happy days; for they appeared to reign as kings on the earth. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, 1:4—6. 4:4,5. 5:8—10. Dan. 7:23—27.) "And judgment was given to them:" they were Christ's assessors, as it were, in the judgment executed on "the beast, the false prophet," and "the devil;" even as all believers will be, when he shall judge the world. (Notes, 3:20—22. Luke 22:28—30. 1 Cor. 6:1—6.)—And he "saw the souls" of the martyrs, confessors, and other eminent Christians of the preceding periods, "who lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."—It has long been contended, and by disputants of various descriptions, whether this prophecy should be understood literally, or figuratively: and when prophecies are evidently unfulfilled, modesty and caution are peculiarly requisite. Yet it is necessary here to give an opinion, with the reasons on which it is formed. I am therefore induced to understand it figuratively, by the following considerations: 1st. The whole book is enigmatical, and full of emblems: so that a literal exposition would often imply absurdity: and the interpreter's business and skill consists principally in explaining emblems, or hieroglyphics. A succession of kings is constantly spoken of, as if they were individually the same persons: the two witnesses who were slain, were "raised again, and ascended into heaven;" when others were sent forth of the same spirit, and to bear the same testimony with greater encouragement and success. (Notes, 11:3—14.) Rome is called Egypt, Sodom, Jerusalem, Babylon; and, in short, this is the style and manner of the whole prophecy, which no man could possibly explain or any other principle. As therefore the Jews expected Elijah to come personally, and knew him not when he came mystically, in John the Baptist; (Notes, Matt. 17:10—13.

3 And [f]cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, [g]and set a seal upon him, that he [h]should deceive the nations no more, till [i]the thousand years should be fulfilled; [k]and after that he must be loosed a little season.

4 And I saw [l]thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw [m]the souls of them that were [n]beheaded for [o]the witnesses of Jesus, and for the word of God, [p]and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; [q]and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.

Luke 1:11—17) so, I apprehend, many Christians, and men of the utmost respectability for piety and learning, have fallen into the same mistake, in expecting a literal and personal resurrection of the martyrs, at the opening of the Millennium; and they would not know them at first, when they arose, (as the witnesses did,) in a numerous race of Christians, resembling them in all their most eminent graces. 2dly. It is unaccountable, that "the souls" of the persons raised should be exclusively mentioned, if the literal resurrection of their bodies was meant: for this rather implies, according to the enigmatical style of the book, that their souls reanimated other bodies; that is, they appeared to live again, in Christians of the same spirit. (Note, 6:9—11.) 3dly. Some have imagined, that the resurrection of all the righteous will precede the Millennium; because "the dead in Christ will rise first." (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) But what do they suppose the state of the earth will be during that period? Will no inhabitants dwell on earth except the risen saints? Or, will all the other inhabitants be wicked? Or, being righteous, will they not die? Or, if they die, will there be three resurrections; one, of the righteous before the Millennium, and another of the righteous after it, and one of the wicked? These questions are not easily resolved on that hypothesis: yet, till they are satisfactorily resolved, the sentiment is wholly inadmissible. The resurrection is always spoken of, as one grand event, occurring nearly at the same time; except, that the righteous will be first raised, and so be prepared to sit with Christ in judgment on the wicked: and it is implied in every one of those declarations, that all the dead in Christ will rise together, before the living shall be changed. (Notes, John 5:28,29. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) 4thly. We cannot conceive, that it could add to the felicity of those, who, being "absent from the body, are present with the Lord," (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21-26.) to come again to dwell on the earth; which must be in some degree a scene of pain, suffering, imperfection, and death, till the present state of things is fully ended: and this will not be till the general resurrection; as it sufficiently appears from the loosing of Satan, and the effects of it, after the Millennium. (Note, 7—10.) 5thly. This is the only place, in which any thing like such a litteral resurrection, previous to the end of the world, is intimated; whereas there are numerous prophecies of an universal prevalence and triumph of true religion throughout the earth. Now is it most reasonable, to interpret so many plain predictions by one expression in this enigmatical book; or to explain that one expression by the many clear predictions, which give another view of it? Or why should the literal sense be here insisted on, when in so many places it must, in that case, be departed from? But, why speak of the literal sense? I cannot see, how the resurrection of souls can literally mean the resurrection of bodies. Now, if the resurrection here spoken of be not a literal, but a figurative resurrection; the same reasons lead us to conclude, that Christ will not come down from heaven personally to reign on earth; but that he will reign spiritually in the prevalence of his gospel, and by his Holy Spirit in the hearts of men in general. The Scriptures speak of his "sitting on the right hand of God" in heaven, till he shall come again to judge the world. (Notes, 1:7. Matt. 25:31—33. Acts 1:9—12. 3:19—21. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Heb. 9:27,28.) Observe, that in the last quotation, the coming of Christ to judge the world is expressly called "the second time;" but on the supposition which we combat, his coming to judgment will be the third time. The expressions concerning his coming to destroy Jerusalem, (Notes, Matt. 24:29—31. Mark 13:24—31.) and those that relate to his presence with and coming to his people, are stronger than any here used; yet no good expositor interprets them of his personal presence as Man, in the primary meaning of them (Notes, John 14:18—24.)—Multitudes then of believers will be raised up at the time predicted, as if animated by the souls of those who had been martyred for Christ, or had protested against antichrist; even as the witnesses were "raised again after three days and a half." (Note, 11:7—12.) These excellent persons will live and reign on earth, in victory, honour, holiness, and joy; being happy in the gracious presence of Christ with their souls, and in their assemblies;

5 But [r]the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. [s]This is the first resurrection.

6 [t]Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such [u]the second death hath no power, but they shall be [x]priests of God and of Christ, [y]and shall reign with him a thousand years.

(Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20.) and without any enemies, or false teachers, to harass, corrupt, or divide them: but "the rest of the dead will not live till the thousand years be ended." 'There is mention made in this prophecy of two sorts of dead persons; those who were slain for the witness of Jesus, and those who were slain by the sword of him that sat on the horse. The former were raised to life, and lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years: but the others lived not again till the thousand years were finished; they had no successors of the same wicked and persecuting spirit, till the devil was let loose after the Millennium.' Guise. This interpretation suits the style of the book, and is to me perfectly satisfactory. The language itself intimated a figurative resurrection, and therefore it was carefully distinguished from the literal resurrection of the dead. (Notes, John 5:24—29.) It is moreover an instance of that wise and proper obscurity, which we always find in prophecies, previous to their accomplishment.—"This is the first resurrection," a spiritual and mystical resurrection; and they who shall partake of it, living in those happy times, will be holy and blessed, far more than Christians in other ages. (Note, 19:9,10.)—When it is added, that "the second death shall have no power over them," it is implied, that they must enter heaven by passing through the first death: nor is there any thing different in what follows, from the language used concerning believers of other times, except that they shall "reign with Christ a thousand years;" which naturally signifies, that a succession of such triumphant Christians, made honourable and happy by the Lord's special presence with them, shall continue through the Millennium; even as the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth, through the whole term of the reign of Antichrist. But on the supposition of a literal resurrection before the Millennium, the expression would imply, that none, except those who were partakers of it, would be free from the dread and danger of the second death.—Some expositors compute the thousand years, after the same manner, as the "three years and a half," or "twelve hundred and sixty days," have been reckoned, each day to signify a year; which would extend this happy period to 360,000 years at least: this, however, seems so much beyond all proportion to the past duration of the world, and so different from all the views elsewhere given of the speedy approach of the day of judgment, that it is not generally regarded. So that, on the whole, we may expect, that a thousand years will follow the final destruction of all the antichristian, idolatrous, persecuting powers; during which pure Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and universal holiness, will be diffused all over the earth; and that all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, superstition, heresy, false religion, injustice, fraud, oppression, cruelty, war, murder, intemperance, licentiousness, with all other evils, which now harass and desolate the earth, will be restrained by the omnipotent operation of the Holy Spirit; and that godliness, righteousness, peace, truth, purity, and love, will render the earth in some measure like heaven itself.—Hitherto the depravity of human nature, and the malignant agency of apostate angels, have been illustrated and displayed, in the state of the world: and the inefficacy of all human inventions, and even of "the word of truth," without the new creating "Spirit of truth," to remedy these evils, has been demonstrated, in opposition to man's proud reasonings. The event of the trial has shown, that nothing, but the power of God himself, can prevent men from listening to the temptations of fallen angels; or from despising, opposing, neglecting, or perverting, the gospel of salvation itself. But at length the Lord will arise; by the almighty power of his providence, he will confine fallen angels; and by the omnipotent operation of his Spirit, he will new create fallen men, generally all over the earth: and then repentance, faith, and holiness will as certainly prevail, as impenitence, unbelief, and unholiness now do. Still, however, Christianity will be the religion of sinners, and there will be defects and sins in believers, and doubtless some unconverted persons, for a short part of their lives at least: for men will be made holy by generation, not born holy: and therefore they will still continue liable to many natural evils, and to death. Yet that measure of righteousness, which such a prevalence of true Christianity must produce, will immensely lessen the quantity even of natural evil.—We may easily perceive, what a variety of dreadful pains, diseases, and other grievous calamities, must cease, were all men true and consistent Christians. All the evils of public and private contention will be terminated: domestic, relative, and social felicity must be exceedingly enhanced. Industry in useful things, with frugality and temperance, would prevent that pinching poverty and distress, which now render multitudes wretched: and a greater fertility of the earth may reasonably be expected; according to the former fruitfulness of Canaan, contrasted with its present sterility. Every man will then try to alleviate, instead of adding to, the unavoidable sorrows of all around him; nor "shall they hurt or destroy in all the holy mountain" of God. The hope of glory, the prospects of a happy meeting in heaven, and the abundant consolations of the Holy Spirit, will render sickness, death, and the loss of beloved friends, far more tolerable than at present: "while communion with God," and 'the communion of the saints,' all being of one heart in the worship and service of God, will make religion a constant feast to their souls; and only inferior to heavenly felicity, because not absolutely perfect. Every one must likewise perceive, how immensely the human species would be increased, if wars, many destructive employments, and intemperance were put an end to; and God's ordinance of marriage were generally substituted, instead of that compound of licentiousness and selfishness, which constitute a vicious celibacy, at least till the prime of life is past; or that forced and prudential celibacy, which comparative or real poverty, united with distrust of Providence, often occasions: things which exceedingly tend to corrupt the morals of the human species; and to destroy the lives of both sexes in youth, almost as much as war itself. We may therefore readily allow, that the number of persons, who shall live on earth, during the Millennium, may be immensely greater, than the whole multitude of all the preceding ages; and, consequently, that far more of the human race may yet be saved than shall perish; even though we do not agree to the computations which have been made concerning it.—The wild notions and extravagant practices, grafted on the belief of a Millennium, have long rendered the name of it contemptible or hateful to numbers: yet we have as just grounds to expect such a happy event, as the Jews had to look for a Messiah; but those who suppose it will be a carnal Millennium, are as much mistaken, as the Jews were in waiting for a temporal Deliverer. It is our duty to pray for the promised glorious days, and to do every thing, in our private or public situations, which can be instrumental in preparing the way for them: even as David made abundant provision for the temple, which Solomon was to build.—Whether the general opinion, that this thousand years will be the seventh thousand from the creation, or the sabbatical millennary, the event must determine: it is evident, however, that the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant.—The rest of, &c. (5) 'It is only the rest that were slain, (19:21.) that "lived not again." It is only those, who had no share in the first resurrection, and so were neither blessed nor holy, (6) nor had their names written in the book of life; and, consequently, those, on whom the second death had taken place; which death they suffered, when "fire came down from heaven and devoured them," and "they were cast into the lake of fire with the devil." (10,15.) And that "the rest" should signify the same persons, cannot seem strange, if we consider, that only four verses intervene betwixt them. And that they must be the same persons, is evident from the connexion of the words; "The rest of the dead lived not, till the thousand years," of Satan's binding, and the saint's reign, were ended.—The dead church lives again, in the same metaphorical sense, in which the rest of the dead, the enemies of the church, live again at the end of the thousand years, when Satan is loosed, and gathers them to battle against the church. The "souls of them, who were slain for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God," are those Christians, who were slain in the time of the ten persecutions; (Note, 6:9—11.) and the souls of them, who worshipped not the beast, are those Christians, who chose rather to die, ... than to be guilty of Romish idolatry: and they are said to live again; as the beast, who had received the wound of death, lived again, in the succession of the antichristian beast, .. who exercised the power of the heathen emperors over the earth, and revived the idolatry of the heathen empire. And as the two witnesses, when slain, are said to live again, ... because a succession of men of the same faith, and the same opposition to the beast, revive and flourish, after they are slain.' Whitby. (Notes, Is, 26:19. Ez. 37:1—14.)—It appears to me undoubted, that the fathers or early writers of the Christian Church in general expected a Millennium; and several of them, a Millennium not materially differing from that above described. But others, gradually following the impulse of imagination, speculation, and carnal passions, advanced sentiments on the subject, so extravagant, so ridiculous, and even so licentious, that sober, yet injudicious men, became ashamed of the general doctrine. Thus it was disgraced, and almost forgotten, during many centuries: but, about the era of the Reformation, it was again revived; and again still more deeply disgraced, by the wild reveries and practical atrocities of those who maintained it, and rendered it subservient to rebellions, insurrections, and every abomination. But, for some considerable time past, the question concerning a Millennium, has been brought forward and discussed in a more sober and holy manner: and, notwithstanding that some still maintain the doctrine of a literal resurrection, and a personal visible reign of Christ on earth, and others favour the view above given; yet it is evident, that the doctrine itself gains more general credence; is exported, or allowed, by writers of widely discordant theological opinions; and has lost by far the greater part of that odium and contempt which formerly attached to it. Nor can I doubt that, in proportion as the Scriptures are diligently and impartially searched and understood, the more generally and unreservedly will the persuasion prevail, that there shall be a Millennium; that it is at hand, even at the door; and that we ought to advert to it, and to those things which may prepare the way for it, in all our studies and writings, and in the improvement of our several talents.—Many things, taken from the concluding chapters of this book, and connected with the opinion of the Millennium, either as directing our expectations respecting it, or as forming objections to it, will, I trust, be proved to relate exclusively to the heavenly world, and the state of the redeemed, subsequent to the day of judgment.—It may, however, be reasonably conjectured, that the restoration to purity and peace, of the Christian church, will be connected with the conversion of the Jews, as a nation, and their reinstatement in their own land: and that this will introduce the conversion of the nations, in which the converted Jews will be most diligent and successful instruments. This seems to be foretold in many prophecies already considered: yet the event alone can fully show the order, manner, and instruments of their accomplishment.—Reigned. (4) Note, 5:8—10.

V. 7—10. At the end of the Millennium, "when the thousand years shall have been completed," God will remove the restraint which had been laid on Satan and his angels, for reasons which we are not competent to understand; perhaps, among others, to show that the long-continued happy estate of the world was not the effect of any amelioration of human nature, as descended from fallen Adam; but of an immediate divine influence on the minds of men by regeneration, "to the praise of the glory of his grace." Being "loosed out of his prison," this great deceiver will again exert himself, and soon excite agents, who with all earnestness, subtlety, and sagacity, will corrupt the gospel; and seduce men into apostacy, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and vice: and thus, the old generation of believers dying, the succeeding race, through many nations, in "the four quarters of the earth," will be deceived by him: and, having themselves departed from the faith, they will be instigated to hate and persecute such as adhere to it. Thus the spirit of antichrist will rise again after the thousand years are expired. Then religious wars will be undertaken, and at length the whole multitude of the apostate nations, even Gog and Magog, as risen again, (Note, 4—6. Ez. 38: 2.) will confederate against the church, and come to fight against her, with armies innumerable as the sand of the sea. It is in vain to inquire, who Gog and Magog will be, or whence they will come: for this also must be understood figuratively, to denote enemies fierce and numerous as Gog and Magog had been before the Millennium; and it is expressly said, that they "were the nations in the four quarters," or corners "of the earth."—When Satan and his angels shall be loosed, a few years will suffice to seduce multitudes into idolatry or infidelity: and then persecutions and massacres of Christians will be as natural as ever, and as readily resorted to; so that it will probably appear to the pious remnant, as if the cause of Christ was about to be altogether ruined. But while these enemies, with most formidable preparations, shall collect from various parts of the world, to compass "the camp," or garrison "of the saints," and to besiege "the beloved city" Jerusalem, (for the images are borrowed from the affairs of Israel, in the wilderness, and in Canaan,) they will be destroyed by fire from heaven. Then the Lord, having once more made manifest the depravity of human nature, and the malice and subtlety of the devil, will cast him finally into "the lake of fire," never more to be set at liberty, or to have power to do mischief; but to be for ever and ever punished with persecuting tyrants, idolatrous and wicked priests, and false teachers; who were his prime ministers during his usurpation, "as god and prince of this world." (Notes, 1—3. 12: 7—12. 19:17—21.)—The opinion that some remote nations will continue idolaters during the whole term of the Millennium, and, at the close of it, come forward as persecutors of the church, which some respectable writers have advanced, and almost taken for granted, seems to have no scriptural support, except that Gog and Magog are mentioned both by Ezekiel and St. John. (Notes, Ez. 38: 39:) It is, however, indisputable, that Ezekiel's prophecy relates to events previous to the Millennium; and that St. John speaks of transactions subsequent to the Millennium. Magog is mentioned among the sons of Japheth; (Note, Gen. 10:1—5.) and is generally supposed to have been the progenitor of the nations formerly called Scythians, and in modern times Tartars; but not of them exclusively; and Gog may be considered as the name, or title, of their king. But, if the same nation be literally and exclusively meant, it may apply to the descendants of Magog, as well after the Millennium as before; and Gog (as Pharaoh, Ptolemy, &c.) may be still considered as the title of their prince. This, however, can hardly be allowed; because Gog and Magog in Ezekiel, come exclusively from "the north quarters;" Gog and Magog in St. John, come "from the four quarters of the earth."—The supposition of whole nations continuing idolaters throughout the Millennium, cannot be made consistent with the general tenor of prophecy; or in particular with these predictions "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ." (Note, 11:15—18.) "All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service." (Note, Ps. 72:8—11.) "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." (Note, Hab. 2:12—14.) "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." (Notes, Dan. 2:34—36,44, 45. 7:9—14.) Many others to the same effect might be adduced.—It cannot reasonably be supposed, that when Satan, with the beast and the false prophet, is removed, and prevented from deceiving the nations: that whole nations should still continue under the gross deception of open idolatry: and if human depravity alone be sufficient (as indeed it is) to account for this; how can it be conceived, that the same depravity should fail to stir up the idolaters to war against the church? Will then a perfect neutrality prevail? Will the zealous Christians of the Millennium, during ten whole centuries at least, make no efforts to convert the idolatrous nations? Or will these nations adhere to their idolatry; and yet show no enmity against those who zealously and perseveringly attempt their conversion? All this is so contrary to scriptural statements, and to the known and experienced propensities of human nature, that it is wonderful it should have been overlooked on this argument.—All over the earth, I apprehend, men will generally be changed by divine grace: but they will be holy, not by natural birth, but by regeneration. Their children will have the same fallen nature as ours have: and, if left unregenerate, and exposed to Satan's temptations and delusions, a few years will suffice to raise up Gog and Magog from the dead. (5) The same causes will produce the same effects; enmity against God will express itself by enmity against his people; the old scenes will be acted over again, and religious wars, persecutions, and massacres, with attempts to exterminate the hated company, must follow more and more; did not God at once interpose to protect his friends, to destroy his enemies, and to bring forward the solemn and long-expected day of judgment.

V. 11—15. After the events above predicted, the end will speedily come: and there are no prophetical intimations of any thing which shall intervene; before the appearing of Christ to raise the dead, and to judge the world. For the apostle next "saw a great white throne," as emblematical of the majesty, dominion, power, and righteousness with which Christ will then be manifested. On this sat One, "from whose presence the earth and heaven fled away;" which, with unexampled and inimitable sublimity, denoted the effulgency of his glory; and the entire dissolution of the visible creation, or the present state of the world, by his power, and at his coming. (Notes, 6:15—17. Matt. 24:29—35. Heb. 1:10—12.)—'It is so plain that it does not need, so majestic and grand, that it exceeds commentary and paraphrase.' Blackwall.—Beyond doubt, it is the grandest idea which ever was expressed in human language; unless some verses in the first of Genesis may be thought to rival it. The sublime conceptions and expressions of the most admired heathen poets are flat, and mean, and low, compared with it.—The apostle then beheld the dead, as raised again, "stand before God." We know that Christ shall "sit on the throne of his glory," to judge the world; and he must, therefore, be here meant. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. Mark 8:38. John 5:20—23. Rom. 2:12—16. 14:10—12. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 4:1—5. Tit. 2:13. Heb. 9:27,28. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)—Before him all nations, and all persons of every rank, character, and description, were gathered. "And the books were opened." This figuratively represents the discoveries which will be made of all the thoughts, words, actions, motives, intentions, dispositions, obligations, advantages, and talents of all men, by the divine omniscience; and the comparison of the whole with the holy law of God; and the recollection and consciousness which every man will have of all his past actions, though he had long forgotten many of them, till thus brought to light and to remembrance. Thus an exact estimate will be made of every person's character; of the evidence and degree of his grace, and of his fruitfulness in good works, or of the aggravations or alleviations of his sins: and the final award will be made in perfect justice and impartiality, connected with truth and mercy. For 'another book was opened, which is the book of life:" otherwise all must have been condemned. This is the emblem of the Lord's knowledge of his people; and his declaration of their repentance, faith, love, and good works, as evidential of their election, redemption, regeneration, and interest in his righteousness, and the blessings of the new covenant. So that "the dead shall be judged," according to the contents of these registers concerning them; and according to their works, whether they evidence them to be true believers, or the contrary. Nor will any be exempted from this impartial scrutiny: for the sea shall "give up the dead" bodies which have been cast into it; and the grave, and separate state, (Note, Ps. 16:8—11.) will give up the bodies and souls contained in them: so that the whole multitude which shall have lived upon earth, through all generations, from the creation to the consummation of all things, will then appear before the throne; all that ever have died shall experience a reunion of their souls with their bodies; and those who shall then live on earth will be changed. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) Then death and hell, the grave, and the separate state, (represented as two persons,) will "be cast into the lake of fire:" that is, they shall subsist no longer to receive the bodies and souls of men; there shall be no death in heaven; and all the wicked will be cast into the place of torment, in which death and the separate state will be swallowed up: for "this is the second death," the final separation of sinners from God, without hopes of being restored to his favour, or delivered from his wrath. (Notes, Hos. 13:14. 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) Into this place of banishment and torment, all will be cast, who shall not be "found written in the book of life," as true believers; according to the general doctrine of the holy Scriptures.—'The meaning is, that temporal death, which hitherto had exercised dominion over the race of men, shall be totally abolished; and, in respect of the wicked, be converted into eternal death.' *Bp. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. We all are, and must be, very incompetent judges concerning the dispensations of God, till the whole plan shall be completed.—Hitherto Satan and his party have been permitted to prosper in an amazing degree; and whole nations, yea, almost all nations, have been "deceived by the old serpent" and his agents: but if partial restraints had not been imposed on them, and unmerited mercy had not been exercised, this earth would have been a counterpart of hell. Ere long, however, "the LORD will make bare his holy arm," to chain up "the deceiver of the nations," and to give effectual success to his gospel; and the earth shall "be filled with his glory, as the waters cover the sea." We shall not indeed live on earth to witness those happy days: yet, if indeed on the Lord's side, we may look forward with encouragement, amidst our conflicts and trials, assured that the cause, in which we are engaged, will at length, even on earth, be decidedly triumphant.—"Great grace" will indeed be on all the hundreds of millions of Christians, who shall then inhabit the earth, and the Lord will manifest himself to them in a degree, of which we now have no adequate conception; so that they will be "holy and blessed" beyond all former generations: we shall not, however, wish to leave our heavenly mansions, to come and dwell among them. They will be out of the reach of the "second death;" but we shall have got over the pain of the "first death:" our spiritual and royal priesthood will be more advantageously exercised in heaven, than theirs can be on earth; and Satan and sin can never more annoy us; but these will never be finally banished from the world, till it is burnt up with all its works. We shall look down, as it were, from heaven, and enjoy the felicity and triumph of our brethren on earth, as much as if we lived among them; while, "being absent from the body, we shall be present with the Lord," in a still more blessed way, than they can be, who "walk by faith, not by sight."—But may not these reflections, on the blessed change which the success of the gospel will make in the state of the world, supply us with an unanswerable argument of its divine original and authority, even previous to the fulfilment of those prophecies which relate to it? Can that doctrine come from any other than God, which wants only to be universally received with obedient faith, to remedy all the evils that fill the earth; and to render men as much like holy and happy angels, as most of them at present are like deceitful, malignant, ambitious, and apostate spirits? The need, in which the world stands of such a remedy, the suitableness of it, its evident tendency, and its efficacy, as far as men actually use it, proclaim its divinity in the most decisive manner; even apart from miracles, fulfilments of prophecy, and all other external arguments whatsoever; yea, in language distinct from, though connected with, that "witness in himself," which is the principal source of assurance to the experienced believer's heart. (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10.)

V. 7—15. Whenever the Lord takes off the restraint from Satan, he is both active and able to deceive the nations, and to propagate lies and mischief among men; and then persecution again lifts up its horrid front, and stalks abroad to riot and revel upon the blood of the saints.—We may even learn profitable lessons from the devil and his angels: for if the servants and ministers of Christ were as united, active, vigilant, and persevering in doing good, as these enemies are in doing mischief, we might hope for better times. Nor shall we do amiss in taking the hint from them, not to think the least opportunity of good beneath our notice; whilst we aspire and aim at the most extensive and important usefulness; for our enemies, when forming horrid plans to destroy, if it were possible, the whole church at once, do not neglect to deceive one soul; or even to defile, mislead, or harass the meanest of those whom they cannot ruin!—But no weapons formed against the church can prosper; (Notes, Is. 41:10—16. 49:24—26. 54:15—17. Zech. 12:2—14. 14:) and all that fight against her shall perish, "with the devil, the beast, and the false prophet," and be "tormented day and night for ever and ever." May we then firmly believe, that 'Christ shall come to be our Judge,' and daily prepare to stand before his awful tribunal, when the "earth and the heaven shall flee from his face, and no place shall be found for them." Let us frequently reflect on "the opening of the books," the "bringing to light of the hidden things of darkness," and the discovery of all characters and actions in their proper colours, which will take place, when the Judge shall "render to every one according to his works." (Note, 1 Cor. 4:1—5.) Then all the dead shall be raised; all distinctions swallowed up, except that "between the righteous and the wicked;" and all will be "cast into the lake of fire," "prepared for the devil and his angels," except the believing and obedient followers of Christ, "whose names are written in the book of life." "Let no man, therefore, deceive himself with vain words, for the wrath of God will come on all the children of disobedience", how many soever they be. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," and "death shall be swallowed up in victory." "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches."

beginning of the Millennium, and the personal reign of Christ on earth for a thousand years, (Note, 20:4—6.) understand these concluding chapters principally of the state of the church on earth at that time. But they come in order subsequent to the account of the general judgment; and we can never attain to a satisfactory understanding of prophecy, if imagination or conjecture be allowed to carry us backward or forward, without any fixed principles. The method which we should take, of clearing up the evidence of the divine inspiration of Scripture, from the accomplishment of prophecy, (and this is no doubt one principal weapon, with which to defend Christianity against all kinds of infidels,) must be, by showing, that there is order and arrangement in the predictions, and a coincidence between them and known facts: and that a regular series of events is foretold, some of which are already fulfilled; and the rest cannot be so, because the order of the prophecy shows them to be yet future. But, in order to this, we must carefully adhere to the proposed arrangement, in our interpretations; not deviating even from the appearance of it, without evident reason. For example, there was a necessity of returning, at the beginning of the twelfth chapter, to the primitive times of Christianity; because another regular series of predictions is there evidently begun, after the other had been completed. (Notes, 10:2—4. 11:15—19. 12:1,2.) This creates a proper degree of prophetical obscurity; and when the key is found, it adds to the consistency, energy, and beauty of the whole. But, having now traced both parts of the book to the end of the world, and the final judgment with its consequences, it must introduce much perplexity, and occasion an appearance of uncertainty and ambiguity, to return back, without any necessity, to the preceding Millennium. As many ages of persecution and tribulation had been predicted; and as this book was in good measure written for the support and encouragement of believers, during those afflicting scenes; so we might naturally expect to hear towards the conclusion of it, some account of their happy state in heaven, as well as of the prosperous times of the church on earth. (Notes, 7:9—17.) But if these chapters do not relate to that subject, we hear indeed of the punishment of the wicked, but nothing concerning the felicity of the righteous. (Note, 20:11—15.) Many of the expressions also are such as cannot consist with any state, where the least remains of sin or sorrow are to be found, or any return of them is to be expected: and those which seem of another nature, are emblematical, according to the style of the whole book; which differs from all others in the New Testament, though it resembles many of the prophecies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah. These reasons induce me to explain what follows of the heavenly state exclusively; except as the reader's thoughts are naturally called off, in some places, to other subjects.—The emblem of "a new heaven and a new earth," has several times occurred, in different senses. (Notes, Is. 65:17—19. 66:19—23.) Some think that Peter wrote after the book of Revelation was published, and alluded to it; (Note, 2 Pet. 3:10—13.) but this opinion is highly improbable; and the Holy Spirit might lead both the sacred writers to the same views and images. It is obvious, however, that Peter spoke of the heavenly state; which is an additional argument to prove that John did the same: and indeed this must be so; for the "first heaven and earth were passed away." (20:11.)—In this new world, "there was no sea;" which aptly represents an entire freedom from polluting and conflicting passions, distressing temptations, tempestuous troubles, changes, and alarms; and from whatever can divide or interrupt 'the communion of saints' with each other. Some think it implies also, that there is abundance of room in that blessed world; as a very large proportion of the earth is now covered with the sea.—The apostle likewise saw "the holy city, coming down from heaven;" the whole church triumphant was shown to him under this emblem; that he might perceive and report something of its glory and felicity, according to man's capacity of apprehending heavenly things: and he thus learned, that its blessedness came wholly from God, and depended on him. It seems to have appeared in the air just before him, that he might contemplate and examine it; (Note, Acts 10: 9—16.) and he perceived that it was prepared as "a bride adorned for her nuptials:" which was another emblem denoting the mutual love between Christ and his triumphant church; their union and communion, and delight in each other; and the glory and felicity thus bestowed upon believers in heaven. (Note, 19:7,8. Ps. 45:9—17.) Thus two emblems, which apparently are not very compatible, concur in giving some instructive idea of this interesting but inconceivable subject.—He then "heard a great voice from heaven," proclaiming, with astonishment at the divine condescension, that "the tabernacle of God was placed with men," and that he would dwell among them as their reconciled Father, notwithstanding all their rebellions! (Notes, 1 Kings 8:17. Ps. 68:18. Is. 57:15,16. John 1:14. 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) They would therefore be "his people," devoted to his service and glory, and he would be with them, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. (Marg. Ref. k.) This has indeed a partial accomplishment, in the present consolations of true believers; but here it must refer to the perfect enjoyment of God in the beatific vision: for "He will then wipe away all tears from their eyes," like a tender Father, who comforts his mourning children, and they will never weep again, either for sin or trouble; as death, and every cause of grief, shall be no more, and "the former things will be passed away." Can these expressions relate to any thing less than the heavenly state? (Notes, 7:13—17. 22:2—5. Is. 25:6—9. 35: 8—10.)—There was no more sea. (1) 'It is evident from hence, that this new heaven and new earth are not designed to take place till after the general judgment: for at the general judgment, "the sea gave up the dead which were in it." (20:13.) Gog and Magog, the nations in the four corners of the earth, are deceived by Satan, after the expiration of the Millennium: but Gog and Magog are not inhabiters of "the new heaven and the new earth."—The church of Christ shall be glorious upon earth during the Millennium; and it shall be more glorious still, in the new earth, after the Millennium, to all eternity.' Bp. Newton.

No more death. (4) Marg. Ref. m.—No expression equally strong on this particular, occurs in any part of Scripture, except where the heavenly state is evidently intended. Ὁ θανατος ουκ εσται ετι.

V. 5—8. "He that sat on the throne," generally in this book denotes the Father personally, as distinguished from "the Lamb that was slain:" but as Christ will appear on the throne of judgment, and had been last mentioned as seated on "the great white throne," (Note, 20:11—15.) it is most obvious to understand the clause of him in this place; and the language employed seems most exactly to accord to him, in his mediatorial character.—The Lord Jesus, therefore, declared in the apostle's hearing, that "He makes all things new." He brings sinners into a new state, and creates them anew to holiness; and he will "make all things new," respecting their situation and manner of living, when he has brought them, perfected both in body and soul, to his glorious felicity. This, John was commanded to "write," for the encouragement of the church, in all its afflictions, conflicts, and temptations; for "these words are true and faithful," on which the most entire dependence may be placed.—The Lord also added, "It is done;" or, "It is come to pass:" the whole counsel of the love of God will be then completed, and the redemption, which the incarnate Son finished on the cross, will be perfectly applied. (16:17. Note, John 19:28—30.) For, being "Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End," he will surely bring the work which he had begun to a glorious conclusion. (Notes, 1:8—11. 2:8,9.)—If then any man, in any age or place, were athirst for the blessings of salvation; if any one were so sensible of his perishing need of these promised benefits, and had such a view of their preciousness, as to be earnest is using means for obtaining them, and would not be satisfied without them, whatever else he possessed or expected, Christ will surely "give him of the Fountain of the water of life freely." (Notes, 22:1,16,17. Is. 55:1—3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.)—Man's sin and folly consist in "forsaking the Fountain of living waters, to hew out broken cisterns, which can hold no water;" his happiness must begin with returning to this Fountain, as opened through the mediation of Christ. (Notes, 7:13—17. Ex. 17:5,6. Ps. 36:5—9. Is. 12:3. 43:14—21. 49:9—13. Jer. 2:13.) Sensual and sinful pleasures are muddy and poisoned waters: the best earthly comforts are like the scanty stagnating supplies of a cistern; when idolized they become "broken cisterns," and yield only vanity, disappointment, and vexation; and all our labour about them, resembles "hewing out broken cisterns, which can hold no water." But the joys of true religion are like the springing

10 And [l]he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me [m]that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God,

11 Having [n]the glory of God: and [o]her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, [p]clear as crystal;

12 And had [q]a wall great and high, and had [r]twelve gates, and at the gates [s]twelve angels, [t]and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel.

13 On the east, three gates; on the north, three gates; on the south, three gates; and on the west, three gates.

14 And the wall of the city had twelve [u]foundations, [x]and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb.

15 And he that talked with me, had [y]a golden reed to measure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof.

16 And the city lieth [z]four square, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, [a]twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal.

17 And he measured the wall thereof, [b]a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel.

18 And the building of the wall of it [c]was of jasper: and the city was pure gold, [d]like unto clear glass.

19 And [e]the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, [f]sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald;

20 The fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysoprasus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst.

21 And [g]the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was [h]pure gold, [i]as it were transparent glass.

waters from a fountain; pure, refreshing, overflowing, always satisfying, never satiating, abundant and eternal. The sanctifying consolations of the Holy Spirit, being the preparation for heavenly felicity, and the antepast of it, are the streams from this Fountain, which flow for us in the wilderness. To those who thirst for them, Christ will give of these waters "freely," without any price paid for them, even supplies adequate to their largest desires; these shall be furnished from time to time, when they come and ask for them, to be their solace in life, and at the approach of death; and then he will bring them to the Fountain-head, that they may drink for ever full draughts of these holy and glorious joys. All this he gives freely; though he purchased it, by the shedding of his blood upon the cross for their sins. Those who "draw waters from these wells of salvation," have indeed many enemies to encounter: but the Lord assures them, that every conqueror shall "inherit all things;" for "He will be his God, and he shall be his Son," and thus be the heir of all things in him. (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:9,10. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Heb. 2:10—13.) V. 9—21. "One of the seven angels, who had the seven vials, full of the seven last plagues," (Notes, 15:1—4. 16:1,2.) having called on John to accompany him, that he might show him "the Bride," "the wife of the Lamb," or the church triumphant, after the completion of the sacred union between Christ and his redeemed people, in the glory of heaven; he was, to his own apprehension, (being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit,) carried to an exceedingly high mountain, and shown a city immensely great, descending out of heaven from God. (Notes, 1,9—11. Ez. 1:2—4. 11:22—25. 40:2.) This interchange of emblems from "the Bride, the wife of the Lamb," to "the holy Jerusalem," shows, that we should only take general ideas from them, and not enter minutely into particulars, in which there is seldom much agreement: and that our complex view of such subjects must be deduced from the whole of them compared together. (Notes, 1—4. 19:7,8. Gal. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:22—25.) This city was illuminated, beautified, and rendered illustrious beyond expression, by "the glory of God," beaming full upon it; which shows that the happiness of heaven consists in immediate communications from God, and in conformity to him. (Note, 22—27.) Thus the light which shone on the city, was like the refulgency of the most admired jewels: the whole as it appeared pendent in the air, shone with surprising lustre and beauty, and was "transparent as crystal:" which may intimate, that our knowledge in heaven will be intuitive, certain, and productive of the most satisfying delight. "The great wall of jasper," (12,17,18.) was in height, or rather in thickness, one hundred and forty-four cubits, according to the measure of a man, from his elbow to the end of his middle finger; for this was the measure used by the angel. (Notes, 11:1,2. Ez. 40:3—5.) This, which was the number of the twelve tribes of Israel multiplied by that of the twelve apostles, may denote the entire security of that residence, which the almighty God has prepared for the whom increase of both the Old and the New Testament churches, when collected together in heaven, where no enemy can approach to annoy or alarm them for ever. (Notes, 7:4—8. 14:1—5.) "Twelve gates," guarded by twelve angels, and inscribed with the "names of the twelve tribes of Israel," implied, that this holy city was open on every side, for the admission of the true Israel of God, even all his believing servants, and to none else: and that angels rejoiced in their security and felicity in heaven, as well as readily ministered to them, during their progress thither. (Notes, Ez. 48:30—35.) The "twelve foundations, inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles," and formed of twelve precious stones, (which John in vision saw in the same manner as he did the rest, the whole being seen pendent in the air,) might show that all who belonged to that holy city obtained their citizenship, by receiving and obeying the doctrine of the apostles respecting Christ and his salvation, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." The whole city rests primarily on Christ himself, "the tried Foundation;" and, in a subordinate sense, on those who published and attested the true doctrine concerning him, who will be honoured there in a peculiar manner: nor will any person enter thither, who does not hold the doctrine of the apostles, in its grand outlines; for thus it has been believed by the church, ever since the first promise to fallen man. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Eph. 2:19—22.) The precious stones may denote that all earthly splendour is mean and contemptible, compared with that of heaven; and that all possible excellency and glory will there combine, abound, and centre for ever. (Notes, Ex. 28:15—29. Is. 54:11—14.) The vast dimensions of the city, being an exact square, fifteen hundred miles on each side, might be emblematical of magnificence, and of room for all the multitude of inhabitants, which should ever enter it, however immense and innumerable. As it is inconceivable how a city could be fifteen hundred miles high; when it is said, that "the length, breadth, and height were equal;" some conclude that no more is meant, than that the height was proportionable to the other dimensions. The whole, however, is enigmatical: and as a cube seems a kind of perfect form, perhaps the language is to be understood according to its obvious meaning: and then we may consider it as an intimation, that the reader is not allowed to form any gross conceptions of the city in his imagination, but to deduce instruction from it, as an emblem. It may also imply the stability, proportion, and uniformity of heavenly things, and the incomprehensible nature and glory of them. (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.)—The city, and the street of it, being "of pure gold, as it were transparent glass," may be an emblem of the union in heaven of those excellencies, which seem here to be incompatible. 'They will be splendid, and durable as the purest gold: clear and transparent as the finest glass. In that happy world the beauties and advantages, which are here divided and incompatible, will unite and agree. Our glass is clear, but brittle; our gold is shining and solid, but it is opaque, and discovers only a surface. And thus it is with our minds. The powers of the imagination are lively and extensive, but transient and uncertain. The powers of the understanding are more solid and regular, but at the same time more slow and limited, and confined to the outside properties of the few objects around us. But when we arrive within the veil, the perfections of the glass and gold will be combined, and the imperfections of each will entirely cease. Then we shall know more than we can now imagine. The glass will be all gold. And then we shall apprehend truth in its relations and consequences, not, as at present, by that tedious and fallible process which we call reasoning, but by a single glance of thought, as the sight pierces in an instant through the largest transparent body. The gold will be all glass.' Newton's Cardiphonia.—The twelve gates made of as many vast pearls, may denote that every thing will be superlatively glorious, beyond all comparison with any thing ever seen on earth.—The marginal references will show the reader, in a manner suited to excite a peculiar interest, that even in those things, which are stated as the glory of the antichristian harlot, the true spouse of Christ will infinitely exceed her. (Notes, 17:3—5.)

V. 22—27. The temple was essential to Jerusalem, the holy city in Judea, as its great ornament and honour; and it made a prominent part in Ezekiel's vision of the church, as I suppose, during the Millennium, under the emblem of the holy city. (Notes, Ez. 40:—48:) But "there was no temple" in the mystical city that John saw; which is a demonstration that the heavenly state was exclusively meant. In heaven there will be no need of external symbols of the Lord's presence; when he shall be fully manifested in his essential glory, as far as is reasonable, and holy creatures can possibly perceive and know him. He will be evidently among them, to communicate unalloyed felicity, and to receive their adorations; and the eternal Son, in human nature, as "the Lamb that was slain," will be "the Temple," in which "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily," will be made manifest to the glorified bodies of the saints; whilst the perfections of the divine nature will be contemplated as "with open face," by the exercise of their intellectual powers. (Notes, 22:2—5. John 1:14,18. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Col. 1:18—20. 2:8,9.)—Neither will this holy city need "the sun or moon to lighten it," or any of the things, which outwardly contribute to our comfort, and are suited to our state, on earth; for "the glory of God will lighten it," yea, the Lamb "will be the Light" and Felicity of it. (Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 84:8—12. Is. 30:26. 60:15—22. Mal. 4:2,3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.) What words can more fully express the mysterious union and coequality of the Son with the Father in the Godhead?—Let the reader also compare carefully the language with that of those Scriptures, which describe in most emphatical terms the most happy and glorious state of the church on earth: and while he perceives some of the same figures employed, he will likewise perceive that this passage is far more energetical than any of them.—The inhabitants of this heavenly city will not only be numerous, far above those of other cities; but even "nations," many nations of those whom Jesus has saved, will dwell in it, and "walk in the light" of God and the Lamb, perpetually and eternally. If "all the kings of the earth" had concurred to bring the whole of their wealth, magnificence, and glory into one place, it could not have borne any comparison with this holy city. Those kings, who belonged to the true church on earth, though they left all their outward grandeur behind them at death, will yet bring all their real honour into it: and all other glory will be done away, eclipsed, or swallowed up in it.—The gates "not shut by day," and there being "no night there," emblematically and affectingly show the liberty, peace, security, and uninterrupted enjoyment of that blessed state: (Note, 7:13—17.) and as believers are "the excellent of the earth," and enter thither from every nation; so it may literally be said, that "they bring the glory and honour of the nations into it;" as well as figuratively, in respect of its incomparable splendour and excellency. Moreover, nothing sinful or unclean, idolatrous, or false and deceitful, can at all find admission into it. All the inhabitants are absolutely perfected in holiness; and all increase, share, and rejoice in each other's felicity; being excellent, loving, and lovely, beyond expression or imagination. (Notes, Is. 52:1. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)

But they, &c. (27) Ει μη οι. John 17:12.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. "There remaineth a rest for the people of God:" and when the idolized objects of worldly men's affections and pursuits shall "pass away, and be no more" for ever, believers shall enter "the new heaven and the new earth," "in which dwelleth righteousness;" and where no tumultuous passions, anxious cares, or changing dispensations, shall disturb their repose to all eternity. "But will God indeed dwell with man?" and will he receive man to dwell with him in heavenly felicity? What then should, for a single moment, divert us from seeking so vast a blessing? Or what words can suffice to express our admiring gratitude? May we seek the adorning and beauty of holiness, and earnestly desire to be found accepted in the righteousness of the Redeemer, and adorned with the beauties of holiness; and then the heavenly Bridegroom will find us prepared, and will rejoice over us to do us good for ever. (Notes, Jer. 32:39—41. Zeph. 3:14—17.) Tears may indeed now furrow our cheeks, and anguish may sometimes distract our hearts; because of sin within us and around us, and because of its distressing effects: but speedily our God will "wipe away all our tears;" and we shall feel and see no more "of death, of sorrow, of crying, or of pain for ever." Let us then pray for "patience, that, having done the will of God, we may inherit the promise."—If we are willing and desirous that the gracious Redeemer should "make all things new," in our hearts and nature, by whatever means he sees good; we need not fear, but that he will "make all things new" in respect of our situation, till he has brought us to the enjoyment of complete felicity: for he is "Alpha and Omega;" his work is perfect, and when he begins to save, he will never leave or forsake those who partake of his grace, and who are the objects of his "everlasting love." If, in bringing us to thirst for the waters of life, he causes us to pass through humiliating dispensations and experiences, we ought not to complain; as this thirst is the preparation for all the blessings of time and eternity, and he will "give to every one that is athirst of the Fountain of the water of life freely." Did we come to him for this blessing more frequently, and pray for it more earnestly, we should be enabled, in the sharpest trials, to realize the Christian paradox, "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing:" but we are too apt to go to broken cisterns; and no wonder in this case that we "go mourning all the day long."—Let then those who are engaged in the combat, have recourse to this never-failing cordial; that, by its exhilarating and invigorating efficacy, their strength may be renewed, till they have won the victory, and are owned as children and heirs of God in Christ Jesus, and possess all things in him.—But surely, the curse is also set before us, in this Scripture, as well as the blessing: and most loudly does Christ say to all, who hear his word, "Fear not them who can kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do;" when such cowards, as dare not own Christ on earth, are ranked with the most abominable sinners, as "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone." Should the Lord speak in thunder from heaven, and protest to sinners by name, that they were in the way to hell; it could not be more manifest than it is at present, if men would but notice it: for while they live in infidelity, impiety, or any of the sins here or elsewhere enumerated; does not God say expressly to them, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish?" But, blessed be his name, he says also to the vilest, "Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

V. 9—27. The angels, who "pour out vials of wrath, and inflict plagues on ungodly men, take pleasure in helping the joy of believers: and the mystical espousals of Christ and his church excite their attention, admiration, and rejoicing praises. But the way in which the Lord teaches us the nature of heavenly glories, implies that we are poor ignorant children, too apt to be pleased with trifles and externals; who must be spoken to in our own language; not being capable of knowing things as they are, or of fully relishing the pure and spiritual felicity of the celestial world. Yet, if any thing

A further description of the heavenly state, 1—5. The angel attests these things to be faithful and true, and again forbids John to worship him, 6—9. Christ himself shows the apostle, that the state of men would soon be unchangeably fixed, by his coming to judgment, 10—12. He declares who would enter heaven, and who would be excluded, 13—15. He urgently invites and calls on all who hear, to unite in all who are athirst, yea all who are willing, to accept of his salvation; and denounces plagues on all, who add to, or take away from, the words of this prophecy, 16—19. The apostle desires the speedy advent of Christ; and concludes with a benediction on his readers, 20, 21.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXII. V. 1. The angel next made known to the apostle, the Source and Current of heavenly blessings, for "he showed him a pure River of water of life." (Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 46:4. Ez. 47:1—10.) This implied the holy nature and effects of those unalloyed pleasures, which flow without interruption or end, for the full satisfaction of all the saints in glory. "The River" was "clear," or transparent, "as crystal;" which may intimate that the happiness of heaven greatly consists in a full, clear, and intuitive knowledge of God, and his glorious perfections and works, constantly exciting all holy and delightful affections in the heart. This River "proceeded out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," as from its fountain; which showeth, that all felicity comes from God, as the all-sufficient Source of life, light, holiness, and joy; and that it is communicated according to his wise and holy sovereignty. But the throne of God was the throne of the Lamb also; (3:21.) and "the River of the water of life" flows to sinful men, through the Person of Emmanuel, and his atonement and mediation. This especially points to the quickening and sanctifying influences and consolations of the Holy Spirit, as given to sinners through Jesus Christ, to be the Author of spiritual and eternal life to their souls. (Notes, Ex. 17:5,6. Is. 12:3. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.) This interpretation, which coincides with so many other Scriptures, gives a peculiarly interesting view of the sacred Trinity; the Father, who sent his only begotten Son to be our Saviour; the Son, who, having finished his work on earth, rose and ascended, and "sat down with the Father on his throne, and ever liveth," as Emmanuel, our divine, our incarnate Mediator; and the Holy Spirit, as 'proceeding from the Father and the Son,' to apply, by his new creating love and power, this salvation to our souls: that 'Glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.' (Marg. Ref. d.)

V. 2—5. "In the midst of the street," or principal place of concourse in the city, and "on each side of the river, was the Tree of life." (Notes, 2:6,7. Gen. 2:8,9. 3:22—24.) This seems not here to mean a single tree, but a species of trees, which grew in the places of public resort for the common benefit of all the inhabitants.—On earth some fruits ripen at one season, and some at another: but this Tree bare "twelve kinds of fruit;" that every month in the year might be supplied, and abundance be united with perpetuity and variety. (Notes, Ez. 47:12.) This was an emblem of Christ, and all the blessings of his salvation, as communicated, constantly and perfectly, to all his redeemed people in heaven, by his own immediate presence with them, and love to them. "The leaves of the Tree," being appointed "for the healing of the nations," implied, that the favour and presence of Christ would finally remove and prevent the return and entrance of all evil, as well as communicate all good, to the inhabitants of that blessed world. So that no "more curse would be there," no sickness, pain, sorrow, wrath, or death: for Adam sinned, even in the garden of Eden, in which grew "the Tree of life," and so fell with his posterity under the curse; but this will never befall the redeemed; as the same sovereignty and omnipotence, which have saved them, will confirm them for ever. For "the throne of God, and of the Lamb," being established there; his servants shall "serve" and worship him for ever, which is their great desire and delight: "and they shall see his face," behold his glory, be assured of his love, and enjoy the fulness of felicity in his presence. (Notes, Matt. 5:8. 1 Cor. 13:8—12. 1 John 3:1—3.) "And his name shall be in their foreheads:" that is, all creatures shall know that they belong to God, and perceive that they bear his holy image.—It is remarkable, that "God and the Lamb," are here spoken of as One, in such a manner, that we cannot determine to which of them the singular personal pronoun belongs. (Note, John 10:26—31.)—In that world of light and glory there will "be no night," no affliction, or dejection, no intermission of service and enjoyment: they will need no candle; no diversions or pleasures of man's devising will there be at all wanted; and even the outward comforts which God has provided, suited to our state in this world, will no longer be requisite. (Notes, 21:22—27. Matt. 22:23—33. 1 Cor. 15:39—49. Phil. 3:20,21.) How very different is this view from a Mohammedan heaven, which could only please gross, sensual, and carnal men, if it were real! But indeed this, and various other notions of heavenly happiness, springing up, as new revelations from time to time; without excepting even the hope of philosophers, of enjoying the pleasure of learned society, an increasing knowledge of nature, and discoveries in science, beyond expression many and great; are mere delusions of the enemy, to sooth men into the opinion, that they may be happy, without submission to the gospel, and without the special favour and enjoyment of God, and without a renewal unto holiness; till the event shall awfully convince them of the fatal delusion. It is indeed most evident, that man, without revelation and regeneration, cannot conceive in what happiness consists. The most ingenious writers of the pagans, fail in nothing more, than in describing the condition of their gods; who are represented as far removed from true happiness as from holiness, and liable to all the vexations of sinful men, with scarcely any peculiar satisfactions superior to what they enjoy: indeed differing little from them, except in power, knowledge, and exemption from death.—In the 282 opinions mentioned by Varro, concerning the chief good, I apprehend that view here given of it by the apostle did not form one.—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

V. 6, 7. (21:5.) The angel's declaration in this passage, that the Lord God had sent him, compared with what follows, (16) has been adduced as a conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ. Indeed we meet with this doctrine, in one form or other, continually: and there is no way of avoiding it, but by rejecting, wholly or in part, the divine inspiration of those books in which it is so undeniably contained.—The Lord Jesus then spake by the angel; solemnly attesting the foregoing sayings, however they might seem to exceed all conception and expectation, to be "faithful and true;" and that He, in whose name all "the holy prophets" had spoken, sent his angel to make known events which would speedily take place. (Note, 1:1,2.) He also declared, that "He was coming quickly," to fulfil these prophecies, to punish his enemies, to deliver his servants, and to take their souls to heaven: but especially to raise the dead and judge the world: and he added a blessing on all, who observed, understood, remembered, believed, and obeyed, the sayings contained in this prophecy: (Note, 1:3.) as this could not fail to increase their faith, hope, patience, steadfastness, and propriety of behaviour, in the church, and in the world.—'Good Vitringa devoutly draw off our affections from earthly objects, to seek "a treasure in heaven," and a permanent mansion in that blessed world, it will be well. "Glorious things are" indeed here "spoken of the city of God;" (Note, Ps. 87:3.) and the whole is well suited to raise our expectations, and enlarge our conceptions, of its security, peace, splendour, purity, and felicity: but, in proportion to our spirituality, we shall be more and more led to contemplate heaven, as filled with "the glory of God," and enlightened by the presence of the Lord Jesus, "the Sun of righteousness," and the Redeemer of lost sinners; knowing that "in his presence is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore." As nothing unclean can enter thither, let us be stirred up, by these glimpses of heavenly things, in giving diligence to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God;" that we may be approved as "Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile," and have a sure evidence that we are written in the "book of life of the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world."

8 And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, [x] I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things.

9 Then saith he unto me, [y]See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: [z]worship God. [Practical Observations.]

10 And [a]he saith unto me, [b]Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: [c]for the time is at hand.

11 He [d]that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: [e]and he that is righteous, let him righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still.

12 And behold, [f]I come quickly; [g]and my reward is with me, [h]to give every man according as his work shall be.

13 I am [i]Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last.

14 [k]Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they [l]may have right [m]to the Tree of life, [n]and may enter in through the gates into the city.

15 For [o]without are [p]dogs, and [q]sorcerers, and [r]whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, [s]and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.

16 [t]I Jesus have sent mine angel [u]to testify unto you these things in the churches. [x]I am the Root and the Offspring of David, [y]and the bright and morning Star.

17 And [z]the Spirit and [a]the bride say, Come. And [b]let him that heareth say, Come. And [c]let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, [d]let him take the water of life [e]freely.

18 For [f]I testify unto every man that [g]heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, [h]If any man shall add unto these things, [i]God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book:

19 And if any man shall [k]take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, [l]God shall wisheth; May the Lord bestow this grace and favour on us, who have employed some time and pains, in the study and explication of this book; that some part of this blessing also may descend to us.' Bp. Newton.

V. 8, 9. (Note, 19:9,10.) While we are surprised, that the apostle should again fall into his former mistake, and need repeatedly the same admonition, we may observe the great wisdom of God in leaving him to do so. It has been remarked, that the idolatrous worship of saints and angels was one great abomination of that antichristian sytem, against which this whole prophecy is principally levelled: and here all palliations of that enormity are answered at once; for the most exalted and beneficent creature, when visibly present, would not allow the least appearance of adoration to be rendered to him: whereas the papists worship creatures when not visibly present, and thus ascribe omnipresence and omniscience to them, as well as other divine honours! It also shows the weakness of the Socinian way of accounting for Stephen's adoration of Christ; because, say they, he was visibly present: but if he had not been also truly God, the martyr would nevertheless have been an idolater. Yet Christ neither reproved him, nor any other person, for showing him this kind of honour, or any other; but directly the contrary: he always honoured those in a peculiar manner, who thus honoured him. (Notes, John 5:20—23. 20:24—29. Acts 7:54—60. 10:24—26.)

V. 10—12. The Lord Jesus is undoubtedly the Speaker in these verses: but some think, that he spoke by the angel as his ambassador; or commanded him to proclaim these words, in his name, and as immediately from him.—'It was not thought sufficient to represent the angel, speaking in the person of Christ; but Christ himself also is introduced; ... speaking in his own person, and confirming the divine authority of this book, and attesting it to be properly his revelation.' Bp. Newton. It is, however, more probable, that Christ again appeared in vision to his apostle, to close the prophecy, as he had done at the opening of it. (Notes, 1:9—20.) He directed the apostle "not to seal the sayings of this prophecy," but to publish them for the use of the church. (Notes, 10:2 -4. Dan. 8:26. 12:4.) For "the time was at hand," when they would begin to be accomplished, nay, they would all indeed soon be completed. (Note, 2 Pet. 3:8.) And, after all these revelations of the will of God and the way of salvation, and the repeated and most earnest exhortations, invitations, persuasions, and entreaties of Christ, by his ministers, obstinate sinners would at length be left to their perverse choice, without further means being used for their conviction; and believers should be exhorted and encouraged to "perseverance in well-doing:" nay, the time would speedily arrive, when the unjust and filthy, the unpardoned and unregenerate, would be irreversibly fixed in such a state, that they would be "unjust and filthy still," and for ever, without hope or remedy; (Note, Matt. 21:17—20. P. O. 17—27.) and the justified and sanctified believer would be perfected and confirmed for ever in righteousness, holiness, and felicity. For, "behold, Christ was coming quickly," bringing his recompense with him, both for his enemies and his people. (Notes, 20:11—15. Is. 40:9—11. Matt. 25:31—46. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.)

V. 13. Marg. Ref. Notes, 1:8—11.

V. 14, 15. Those who "do the commandments of God," as delivered to sinners in the gospel, by repentance, faith in Christ, attendance on the means of grace, and renewed unreserved obedience from evangelical motives, are "blessed;" and they have a "right," or privilege, derived from grace, to "the Tree of life," (Note, 2—5.) or all the blessings of salvation by Christ, and admission into heaven; (Note, 21:9—21.) that they may there have fellowship with God and his holy angels, for ever and ever. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—27. 12:46—50.) —But without the city, even "in the lake of fire," (for there is no middle place, or condition, so much as intimated,) "are dogs," selfish, greedy, fierce, and sensual persons, or apostates; (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Matt. 7:6. Phil. 3:1—7.) with others of a like hateful character, especially those who love a carnal, flattering lie, in preference to the holy and humbling truth of God, and who invent and propagate lies for their own selfish purposes: all other liars may also be included. (Note, 21:5—8.)—As idolaters are mentioned separately, the making and worshipping of images cannot, with propriety, be considered as specially intended. But the whole prophecy being, in a peculiar manner, directed against the delusions, or lies, with wich "the devil," by means of "the beast and the false prophet," and other impostors, "deceived all the nations of the earth;" and the idolatry of the church of Rome being only a part of her "deceivableness of unrighteousness;" it may fairly be supposed, that they, who thus "spake lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron," were particularly, though not exclusively, meant, by those "who loved and made a lie." (Notes, 12:7—12. 13:5—17. 2 Cor. 11: 13—15. 2 Thes. 2:8—12. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)—Sorcerers, &c. (15) Marg. Ref. q, r.

Right. (14) Εξουσιαν, rendered power, in another remarkable declaration. (Note, John 1:10—13.)

V. 16, 17. The Lord Jesus, in many respects, used the ministry of an angel, in testifying to the churches, by his servant John, the predictions of this book. (Note, 1:1,2.)—The Saviour, in his divine nature, was the Root from whom David sprang; and he was, as Man, his promised Seed. (Notes, 5:5—7. Matt. 22:41—46.) He was also "the bright and morning Star." 'His rising up in his incarnation introduced the gospel-day: his rising in power introduceth the millennial day; his rising in the saving influences of his Spirit, introduceth the spiritual day of grace and comfort; and his appearance to judge the world, will introduce the eternal day of light, purity, and joy.' Brown. (Note, 2:24—28.)—"The Spirit," by the sacred Word, and by his convictions and influence in the sinner's conscience, says, "Come" to Christ for salvation: (Notes, John 16:8—15.) "the Bride," or the whole church militant and triumphant, says "Come," and share our felicity. It therefore behooves every man, who hears the invitation, to call on others to "come." (Notes, Is. 2:2—5. Jer. 50:4—6. Mic. 4:1—3.) In fine, "let every man," throughout the earth, who "thirsts" for salvation, "come" to Christ. Nay, lest any should hesitate, as not able to determine whether their thirst be spiritual or not, it is added, "Let whosoever will," (or is willing) "come, and take of the water of life freely," as he would take water from a well, which belonged in common to him and to all his neighbours: nor ought he think of paying for these blessings except as he throws away his poison to receive food, or his dross to receive gold. (Notes, 21:5—8. Is. 55:1—3. John 7: 37—39. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 6:1,2.)

V. 18—21. The Lord Jesus concluded this address, and this book, and indeed the whole of his word, by "testifying as the Amen, the true and faithful Witness," (Note, 3:14—16.) to every one who heard the words of this prophecy; that if any man "added any thing" to what was contained in it take away his part [o]out of the book of life, [m]and out of the holy city, [n]and from the things which are written in this book.

20 He [p]which testifieth these things saith, [p]Surely I come quickly: [q]Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

21 [r]The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

as of divine authority, "God shall add to" or heap on him, "the plagues which were written in the book:" and, on the other hand, if any one should presume to "take any thing away" from it; God would take away from him his part "out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book:" even the blessings which he appeared, or thought himself, to be entitled to; or which he otherwise might have obtained. (Notes, 3:4—6. 20:11—15. 21:9—27.) This seems primarily meant of "the book of Revelation;" with which as much liberty has certainly been taken, as with any part of Scripture. But, as the Lord doubtless intended this for the conclusion of the sacred Canon; and as the crime is similar, in respect of all other parts of the word of God; it may fairly be applied to the whole written word: and it warns every man, in the most awful manner, to "add nothing to, and take nothing from," what God has revealed, of doctrine, ordinance, or commandment; the standard of truth, the way of acceptance, the evidence of conversion, or the rule of duty. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5,6. Matt. 15:3—14. Luke 11:52.) Enthusiasts, pretenders to new revelations, bigoted sectaries, and imposing churchmen, on the one hand; with infidels and skeptics on the other, and all who to maintain their unscriptural tenets, or to exclude those mysteries which they reject, would either expunge part of the sacred Canon, or invalidate its divine authority; with all those, who think or say that it is of no consequence what men believe, (which takes away all doctrinal truth at once,) have abundant cause to tremble at this solemn warning. Critics, who are continually proposing conjectural alterations, or expunging from the text of Scripture and adding to it, often on frivolous grounds, on slight authority, and in a dogmatical and self-confident spirit, I had almost said, in a wanton manner, are in no small danger: and expositors in general have abundant cause to be cautious and humble. Indeed, I am ready to tremble at the awful responsibility to which I had subjected myself, when I write upon this testimony of Christ, and think of the work in which I have been, during so many years, engaged. But the merciful Saviour will no more condemn unintentional mistakes, in the honest writer, who desires to help men to understand his word, and proceeds in simple, humble dependence on his teaching, than he will the honest preacher, and I trust this effort to explain his holy Scriptures, though feeble and defective, has been conducted from proper motives, and in dependence on the Lord. I can confidently appeal to my heart-searching Judge, that I have, as far as I know, written, word for word, what I supposed he would have me write; without adding, altering, or keeping back the sense of any passage, willingly, to serve any personal end, or party interest, from fear of incurring reproach or opposition, or desire of conciliating the favour of any man or set of men whatever: and that the mistakes which have been made, were involuntary, the effects of ignorance and error, and not of design.—After this most solemn warning, our Lord declared, that he was "coming quickly;" and the apostle, in his own name, and that of the church, added, "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus;" and then concluded with the usual benediction on his readers in general, or on the seven churches of Asia in particular. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1:4—6. Mal. 4:1—6. 2 Cor. 13:11—14, v. 14.)—'Men are sometimes apt to think, that if they could but see a miracle wrought in favour of religion, they would readily resign all their scruples, believe without doubt, and obey without reserve. The very thing that you desire you have. You have the greatest and most striking of miracles, in the series of Scripture prophecies accomplished; accomplished, as we see, in the present state of almost all nations, the Africans, the Egyptians, the Arabians, the Turks, the Jews, the Papists, the Protestants, Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, the seven churches of Asia, Jerusalem, and Rome. And this is not a transient miracle, ceasing almost as soon as performed; but is permanent, and protracted through the course of many generations. It is not a miracle delivered upon the report of others, but it is subject to your own inspection and examination. It is not a miracle, exhibited only before a certain number of witnesses; but is open to the observation and contemplation of all mankind; and, after so many ages, is still growing, still improving to future ages. What stronger miracle therefore can you require for your conviction? Or, what will avail, if this be found ineffectual? Alas! if you reject the evidence of prophecy, "neither would you be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." What can be plainer? You see, or may see, with your own eyes, the Scripture prophecies accomplished, and if the Scripture prophecies are accomplished, the Scripture must be the word of God: and if the Scripture is the word of God, the Christian religion must be true.' Bp. Newton.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. May the Lord show to us the streams of "the pure River of the water of life, which proceed out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb;" that, receiving the precious gift of the life-giving Spirit, we may be made meet for "the inheritance of the saints in light." All other streams are polluted or will soon dry up; but this will flow, "clear as crystal," without alloy or interruption, for evermore. They who drink of this water, and eat of "the fruit of the Tree of life," "shall hunger and thirst no more:" they will soon arrive where sin and sickness shall be no more known for ever, for "the leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations:" no "curse" will there be found; but blessing only and eternally, "from the throne of God and the Lamb," in the service and presence of their beloved Lord, and in bearing his image, and being filled with all his fulness. No more complaints will then be heard, of darkness, desertion, or temptation: and there will be no need of worldly pleasures or amusements; as "the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign for ever and ever." "These are true and faithful sayings;" but they are so vast, that we need to pray continually, "Lord, increase our faith," or we shall not be able to receive them, however attested to us.—We should give due honour to the instruments of good to our souls; but we must "worship God" alone: for angels, apostles, prophets, and all believers, are "fellow-servants," or brethren; and Christ is the Lord of all. (Note, Matt. 23:8—10.)

V. 10—21. Soon will our Saviour and Judge come to determine our eternal state: but how dreadful will it be to the impenitent and polluted sinner, to be consigned to eternal unrighteousness and filthiness; and to be left "without among dogs and sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, idolaters, and all liars!" Oh, may we be found "righteous and holy," and be confirmed in his holy favour and service, as our eternal and unchangeable felicity, when he shall "come, and his reward with him, to render to every man as his work shall be!" Never let us think, that a dead or disobedient faith will save us; when the "Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last," has declared them alone "blessed, who do his commandments," and thus prove their "right to the Tree of life, and to enter in by the gates into the holy city." These things he has abundantly testified by his messengers to the churches: and by diligently attending to them, we may hope to have him dwell in our hearts, as "the bright and morning Star," ushering in the eternal day. But if sinners be alarmed, and begin to desire his salvation, let them remember "that the Spirit and the bride say come;" and all that hear should say to every one of their relations, friends, and neighbours, "Come;" yea, "whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." Nay, we should all endeavour, as much as possible, to cause the gracious invitation to sound through every land, and to every human being.—Ought not then the ministers and professors of the gospel, to beware of adding any thing, as a restriction on these large and open invitations, or of deducting any thing from them, or of altering in any way the terms of a sinner's acceptance and salvation? God alone is the Judge of men's motives and intentions; but we should keep at the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous precipice, which is here pointed out to "every man who heareth the words of this prophecy;" and down which multitudes, in every age, rush headlong into destruction. The Lord deliver us from this condemnation! And may the writer, and all the readers, of these observations, have a well-grounded confidence in Christ, and be of that number, who love and long for his appearing, saying, "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus."—The God of all mercy and grace, be pleased to pardon all that is erroneous and faulty in this publication: and to his holy name be all the praise of whatever is true and profitable! Thanks be to God for having given the writer health, strength, and ability to revise, and bring to a conclusion, another edition of so large a work. May numbers have as much cause to be thankful for benefit derived from the perusal of it, as he has for the advantage which he has found in writing it. that so Glory 'may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost: as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.'—And, "may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all, now, and for ever. Amen."

A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW OF THE PREDICTIONS CONTAINED

THE REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.

THE intention of this retrospect, is merely to collect, and to place before the reader in one view, the outline of the interpretation of the book, which has (not without many interruptions of the subject) been adopted in this publication. The introductory chapters do not seem to require any retrospect: the prophetical part properly so called, begins with the opening of the seals, in the sixth chapter; which, containing six of the seven seals, has been interpreted to predict, first the progress of the gospel during the period intended; and then the gradual undermining of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, by several successive judgments, till it was terminated by the conversion of the Emperors to Christianity. The seventh chapter has been explained, as predicting, in the former part of it, the enlargement of the church, in consequence of the revolution above mentioned; and in the latter part of it, as describing the blessedness enjoyed with Christ in heaven by the martyrs, and suffering Christians, who had lived during the pagan persecutions.

In the eighth chapter, under the seventh seal, the sounding of seven trumpets is announced, all of which fall under this last seal: but the sounding of four only is here mentioned; with an awful denunciation of "woe on the inhabitants of the earth," when the other three trumpets should be sounded, which, from this circumstance, are generally called, 'The three woe-trumpets.' The four trumpets, the sounding of which is mentioned in this chapter, are interpreted to predict, the gradual subversion of the Roman empire, after it became professedly Christian, but was continually more and more corrupted with superstition and idolatry, and stained with persecution, by the Goths, Huns, Moors, and Vandals: till the whole fabric seemed completely demolished, by the death of the last feeble and obscure emperor, called Momillus, or, contemptuously, Augustulus.

The sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets, or the two first woe-trumpets, in the ninth chapter, with the events recorded under each, is interpreted to predict the Mohammedan imposture, and its most destructive success; especially in the east, first under the Saracens, headed by Mohammed and his successors; and then, under the Othmans, or Turks, the effects of which remain to this present day.

The tenth chapter is considered as a vision introductory to the opening of "a little book," a kind of appendix, or council, to the book with the seven seals; attended by some other intimations, which are afterwards more particularly elucidated.

The eleventh chapter, which (exclusive of the concluding verses, relating to the sounding of the seventh trumpet,) is here supposed to be this little book, or appendix, is interpreted to predict the state of the church in the western regions, during the term of the fifth and sixth trumpets: while Mohammedism made such tremendous ravages in the east, or during the period of the twelve hundred and sixty years. This prediction shows the extremely corrupt state of the nominal Christian church; which yet is supplied, during the whole term, with a competent number of suffering witnesses for the truth, who protest against these corruptions: till at length they are slain, their testimony is silenced, and their enemies triumph: but only for a very short time, after which the witnesses arise, ascend into heaven, and tremendous judgments on their enemies make way for the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and the final and universal triumph of the Redeemer's cause, or are connected with those events. The latter circumstances are in this work considered as future; though many eminent expositors are of another opinion, respecting the slaying and rising again of the witnesses, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

The concluding verse of the eleventh chapter is here considered as introducing the prophecy of the twelfth chapter, in which the apostle is supposed to resume his subject from the close of the sixth or seventh chapter; or the revolution, by which the Roman empire became professedly Christian, under Constantine the great; in order to give a more detailed prediction of those events, especially relating to the western world, which had before been very compendiously intimated.—Satan, by his agents and vicegerents, the Pagan persecuting emperors, having in vain endeavoured to prevent this revolution; and being, with all their coadjutors, cast out, degraded from authority, and deprived of power to do mischief, in the way which they had formerly done, have recourse, with great zeal, to other measures. And the Devil, having failed of success as a roaring lion, appears as a dragon, a deceiver, yet a destroyer. The church, however, and her seed, before the new projects are ripe, has a place provided in the wilderness, to which she flees at the appointed time, and is secured during the period of twelve hundred and sixty years; which is repeatedly mentioned both by the apostle, and the prophet Daniel.

The thirteenth chapter is interpreted to predict the rise, establishment, and dominion of the papal persecuting Roman empire, as the ten-horned beast; of the popish Clergy, as the two-horned beast; and of the Pope, as the image of the beast: with the mark and number of the beast; and the persecutions and cruelties which would be perpetrated by this antichristian power.

The fourteenth chapter is interpreted, as predicting the opposition made by the remnant of true believers, to this antichristian power; and their protest against its abominations, under the name of "Babylon the Great;" and the several stages of that reformation, which at length was effected in the protestant and reformed churches; with a general intimation of those tremendous judgments, by which at last the whole papal persecuting empire will be destroyed, under the image of a harvest and a vintage.—The fifteenth chapter contains a vision of seven angels; having "seven vials, containing the seven last plagues," which were about to be poured out, and in which the wrath of God would be fulfilled.—The pouring out of all these vials is here supposed to take place, under the seventh trumpet; as all the seven trumpets fall under the seventh seal.

The sixteenth chapter records the pouring out of the seven vials, which is interpreted to predict the succession of judgments, by which the papal persecuting empire and church, and Rome itself, the metropolis and centre of both, will be utterly desolated. The whole, or by far the greatest part of this prophecy, however, is here considered as yet unfulfilled; though some interpret the pouring out of the three first vials, to predict the late events on the continent.—The seventeenth chapter gives a figurative, but most intelligible description of the beasts, both the ten-horned beast, and the two-horned beast, with the extent and seat of their empire.—The eighteenth is interpreted, by all protestant expositors, as a prophecy of the utter desolation of Rome, for all her abominations; with the terror, distress, and ruin of all her adherents, and the exulting joy of the true church of Christ.—In the nineteenth chapter, after a still more animated description of the joy and praise of all the servants of God, on account of these events, and the glorious and blessed effects which will follow, is a prophecy of the subsequent efforts against true Christianity, made by the remains of the antichristian party, under the conduct of "the beast, and the false prophet," or "the two-horned beasts;" and of the final victory obtained over them, ending in their entire destruction, and the casting of "the beast and the false prophet into the lake of fire burning with brimstone."

Still, however, Satan himself, the grand deceiver of all nations, remains at liberty; and ready to make further efforts against the cause of Christ: but the twentieth chapter opens with a prediction of his being bound, and cast into the bottomless pit for a thousand years. Then the Millennium, or triumphant reign of Christ for a thousand years takes place; at the close of which, Satan, being again liberated, successfully renews his efforts; and impels those whom he has deceived and drawn into apostacy from God, to levy war, with tremendous force and violence, against the remnant of believers. But at that crisis, fire from heaven consumes the assailants, the devil is finally consigned to the place of torment; the general judgment immediately succeeds; and, all the wicked being cast into the lake of fire, the state of the righteous in heaven is described in the two concluding chapters, with many coincident instructions and exhortations.

This is the scheme of interpretation adopted in this publication; and it is, at least, the result of much study and reflection on the subject.—One thing further remains to be noticed. Some modern expositors, especially Mr. Faber, suppose another persecuting power to arise towards the end of the twelve hundred and sixty years, distinct from the ten-horned and the two-horned beasts; which is properly to be considered as ANTICHRIST, as an infidel king, an atheistical and not popish domination.—The author, when he read this, purposed to give an opinion on the subject, in his exposition of Revelation; but he really found no convenient place, in the body of the work, for introducing it. For, though by no means decided against the sentiment, or averse to it, nay, allowing that modern events may seem to countenance the supposition, he could find no such third power distinctly mentioned, or even hinted at, by St. John. So that proceeding to the close of the book, without finding a proper opening for the subject; he saw no better way, than to mention this circumstance at the close of it.—In respect to the word ANTICHRIST, and the character of Antichrist, he must refer the reader to the notes on the first epistle of St. John.—(Notes, 1 John 2:18—25. 4:1—3.)

Some think the Kor, or Κορος, Luke 16:7. to be the same as the Chomer: but this is not fully agreed on.
The firkin, as mentioned John 2:6. is differently computed. Some think it contained	0	3	1¼
The measure, or Chœnix, mentioned Rev. 6: 6. seems to have been the daily allowance made of corn to a slave, perhaps rather more than	0	1	0
That mentioned 2 Kings 7:1. is supposed to have contained about	2	0	0

A Table of Weights and Money. By Troy Weight.

	lbs.	oz.	Pen.	Grs.
The Gerah $\frac{1}{20}$ of a Shekel	0	0	0	12
The Bekah $\frac{1}{2}$ a Shekel	0	0	5	0

The Maneh, 60 Shekels	2	6	0	0

Litra, John 12:3. 19:39.

N. B. Some make the Shekel, according to which all the others weights are computed, rather less than in this table; and others rather more.

Money, in Value.

This is a subject of a very difficult nature: for money is mere relative property; and its value consists in the quantity of things useful to life, which it will purchase. Now it is certain, that the same weight, either of brass, silver, or gold, will at one time, and in one place, purchase far more of these things, than in another time and place: and probably, an ounce of silver, in any of the times of which the Scripture treats, would purchase as much as three, or four, or five ounces now would. All, therefore, that can be attempted on this head, is to show the relative value of the money mentioned in Scripture, as computed in the money of this age and nation. An ounce of silver is generally, I believe, coined into something more than five shillings: but as minute exactness is not the object in this place, the computation will be made at that price.

A Table of Time.

Learned men state the names of the months, and the relation to the months into which we divide the year, as follows: but all the names mentioned are not found in Scripture. Of those which are, a reference to some text, in which it is named, will be annexed.

1 Nisan. (Neh. 2:1.) or Abib (Ex. 13:4.)	March, April
2 Zif, (1 Kings 6:1.) or Jyar	April, May.
3 Sivan, (Esth. 8:9.)	May, June.
4 Tamuz, or Thamuz	June, July.
5 Ab	July, August
6 Elul, (Neh. 6:15.)	August, September.
7 Ethanim, (1 Kings 8:2.) or Tifri	September, October.
8 Bul, (1 Kings 6:38.) or Maicheswan	October, November.
9 Cisleu, or Chisleu, (Neh. 1:1.)	November, December.
10 Tabeth, (Esth. 2:16.)	December, January.
11 Shebor, or Sebat, (Zech. 1:7.)	January, February.
12 Adar, (Ezra 6:15.)	February, March.
13 Ve-adar, or the second Adar.

This last month was added, or intercalated, from time to time; when the twelve lunar months, falling considerably short of a solar year, introduced such an irregularity in the seasons, as was inconsistent with the observance of the sacred festivals at the proper time. This month being on those occasions, added between the end of Adar, the twelfth month, and the beginning of Nisan, the first month, brought back the computation of the year to some degree of regularity. It answered the purpose, in some measure, which the 29th of February every fourth year, does in our days: viz. to preserve a coincidence between the twelve months, which constitute the year, and the actual yearly revolution of the earth round the sun. But the intercalated month by no means settled the calculations of the Israelites, in that degree of exactness, to which astronomers have at present reduced it. The months of Israel as here stated, are supposed to answer, each to the closing half of the former and the first part of the latter of our months, as annexed to them; but these intercalatory months, and especially the absolute necessity which there was for them, must considerably deduct from accuracy in all these calculations. They are, however, sufficiently exact for all useful purposes.

The days of the week were numbered by the Israelites in their order, the first, the second, &c. the seventh, or last day of the week, being the sabbath; but it does not appear that they had any names affixed to them.

Their days were generally reckoned, from the setting of the sun to the next setting of the sun, according to the original arrangement; "The evening and the morning were the first day."

Both the night, from sunset to sunrise, and the day, from sunrise to sunset, were divided into twelve hours; which must have been unequal in their length, at different seasons of the year. It should, however, be remembered, that the land of promise, being situated much nearer the Equator, the difference in the length of the days in summer and winter, and of the nights during winter, in proportion to the days, was far less than in this country.—Some, however, think, with much probability, that the division of time into hours, was introduced by the Romans. The word hour, as used in some places of the Old Testament, does not seem to denote a measure of time; but merely the coincidence of events.

The night likewise, from sunset to sunrise, was, among the Israelites, divided into four watches.—Supposing the sun to set at six o'clock, according to our computation; the first watch reached from 6 to 9; the second, from 9 to 12: the third, from 12 to 3; and the fourth, from 3 to 6, or sunrising.

A TABLE OF SOME OF THE STATES, OFFICES, AND DESCRIPTIONS OF MEN,

AS MENTIONED IN THE CANONICAL SCRIPTURES.

PATRIARCHS. Fathers and heads of families, who eventually become renowned and celebrated in Israel: as the twelve sons of Jacob; and David the ancestor of the kings of Judah.

JUDGES. In the common use of the word, magistrates in general are intended, whether superior or inferior: but it frequently marks out those temporary supreme rulers, whom God raised up, to reform religion and deliver his people, before he placed kings in hereditary succession over them; that is, from the death of Joshua, to the nomination of Saul to be king, or rather of David, as substituted in Saul's place.

ELDERS. This word is used with great latitude in Scripture: but it more especially denotes the seventy persons constituting the council, or Sanhedrim of Israel; and after the establishment of Christianity, the stated pastors and teachers of the Christian church.

KINGS. The kings, of David's race, were especially appointed to that office, in hereditary succession, by God himself; but for Solomon's sin, ten tribes were taken from his family, and given to Jeroboam.—Thus, the kings of Judah, of David's race, and the kings of Israel, or the ten tribes of several families, reigned separately, till the days of Hezekiah; when Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, was finally carried captive.

ISRAELITES. This is the proper name of the whole nation, as descended from Jacob, or Israel; and became appropriate to the ten tribes only, after their revolt from David's family.

JEWS, OR JUDEANS. The descendants of Judah, with the Levites, Benjamites, and others, who joined themselves to Judah, after the division of the kingdom, are meant by this name.—It is therefore manifestly improper, though very common among learned men, to call the nation in general JEWS, at any period of their history, till about the time of the Babylonish captivity; when the ten tribes being dispersed, all the remains of the nation gradually received this name, and are known by it to this day.

A HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS. A lineal descendant from Heber and Abraham; and not one who had been proselyted, or whose ancestors had been proselyted.

A PROSELYTE. A person, from another nation, who was incorporated into the church of Israel, by receiving circumcision, and becoming obedient to the law of Moses. Learned men distinguish between different kinds of proselytes, but the Scripture does not.

HIGH PRIEST. The priest of Aaron's race, who was allowed and required to enter into the most holy place, was constituted chief ruler of the church of Israel, and was the special type of Christ.

SECOND PRIEST. He, as it is generally supposed, who was appointed to officiate for the high-priest, in case he was disqualified.

CHIEF PRIESTS. The Heads, or principal persons, of the twenty-four orders, into which the sons of Aaron were divided by David, that they might serve in rotation.

LEVITES. The descendants of Levi, by Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, who were not of Aaron's race; but, in many respects, servants to the priests, yet often teachers and magistrates in Israel.

NETHINIM. Servants to the priests and Levites, for the meaner and more laborious offices; being the descendants of the Gibeonites and of others who were voluntarily devoted to these services.

PROPHETS, OR SEERS. Extraordinary ministers of religion, whom God raised up to reveal his will to mankind, to reform Israel, and to predict future events; especially the coming of the Messiah, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow.

SONS OF THE PROPHETS. Persons educated in the schools of the prophets, from the days of Samuel, who instituted them; from whom God frequently called men to the prophetical office; and who on many occasions, were extraordinary teachers of true religion, when the priests and Levites neglected their duty.

SCRIBES. Learned men, whose professed object was to expound and enforce the law of God, from the days of Ezra to those of our Lord.—The word scribe in the history of Israel, under regal government, generally means secretary; that is, to the king.

RABBIES, DOCTORS, LAWYERS. Scribes, who had attained to certain degrees of eminence or reputation in their profession; and who were distinguished in a manner, not wholly unlike the academical honours conferred by modern universities.

TIRSHATHA. The governor of the Jews, appointed by the Persian kings, after the captivity.

TETRARCHS. Persons, each of whom were appointed by the Roman emperors, to govern a fourth part of that district, which had formed the kingdom of Herod the great; and which, at his death, was divided into four governments. (Note, Luke 3:1.)

CENTURIONS. Officers in the Roman army commanding a hundred men.

PUBLICANS. Tax-gatherers, under the Romans. The principal publicans farmed large districts, at an annual rent; and were aided by the Roman armies, in exacting their demands from individuals; and the inferior publicans rented smaller tracts of them, or were their servants.

PHARISEES. A sect among the Jews, in the days of Christ, (having sprung up some time before,) which, under the profession of extraordinary strictness and sanctity, was remarkable for hypocrisy, pride, censoriousness, and covetousness. They however maintained the true doctrine concerning the resurrection, and received all the books of the Old Testament, as divinely inspired, even as "the oracles of God."

SADDUCEES. A sect of infidels among the Jews, who, professing indeed some regard to certain parts of the Scriptures, denied the resurrection, disbelieved a future state, and the existence of angels and spirits.

HERODIANS. Sadducees, who shaped their religion to outward circumstances, and especially paid court to Herod. Some say, they professed to believe that King Herod was the Messiah.

SAMARITANS. The descendants of the nations whom the kings of Assyria settled in the country, from which they dispossessed the ten tribes; united with some Israelites, and apostate Jews, and Jewish priests, who established a schismatical religion in Samaria, which produced the most determined reciprocal enmity and antipathy between them and the Jews.

NAZARINES. A name by which the Christians were at first distinguished, but afterwards applied to an heretical sect.

STOICS. A sect of heathen philosophers, who prided themselves in apathy, or an affected indifference to pleasure or pain; who considered virtue as its own reward; and who maintained that all events were determined by fate, as superior to the will of the gods, even of the supreme God.

EPICUREANS. A sect of heathen philosophers, who ascribed all things to chance, and considered pleasure as the chief good.

APOSTLES. Persons, selected by Jesus Christ, to be the witnesses of his life and death, and especially of his resurrection, to mankind; the repositories of his holy doctrine, from whom it should be communicated to the nations, and to all future ages; and who, by their preaching and writing, should make known his holy religion; so that to the end of the world, their doctrine must be appealed to, as the standard of truth and duty.

EVANGELISTS. For many ages, this word has marked out the writers of the four narratives, which have been transmitted to us, as of divine authority, concerning the miracles, life, death, and resurrection of our blessed Saviour: but in the New Testament, it signifies simply preachers of the gospel; yet with a special designation of certain persons, who, under the authority and direction of the apostles, (the principal missionaries of Christ to mankind,) were sent forth to establish and regulate the churches planted by the apostles, and to plant new churches. They seem to have been distinguished from stated pastors, in nearly the same manner as modern missionaries are from resident ministers.

BISHOPS. The same persons are in many places called both bishops and elders; but it is generally and with great probability supposed, that after a time, the bishops became the superintendents and overseers, not only of the churches, but of the pastors also, each in a limited district.

DEACONS. Persons appointed, by the counsel and direction of the apostles, to take care of the poor, and the secular concerns of the churches; from whom, however, it seems evident, that elders and evangelists were frequently chosen, and sent forth.

NICOLAITANS. A corrupt company of heretics, answering in many respects to the Antinomians of modern times. There is however no proof, that they were the disciples of Nicolas, one of the first deacons; indeed the supposition is in the highest degree improbable

6:3—22.	God denounces the flood, and commands Noah to build the ark . .	1536	2568
5:32.	Noah being 500 years old, his eldest son is born	1556	2448
5:30,31.	Lamech dies, aged 777, being the first who is recorded to have died a natural death before his father	1651	2353
26,27.	Methuselah dies, aged 969	1656	2348
6.7:	The Deluge	1656	2348
	Thus Adam lived till Lamech, the father of Noah, was 56 years of age: Noah was 595 years of age, when Lamech died; and Shem was above 90 at the same time. For it is not clear, which of Noah's sons was the first-born.
	From the Deluge to the calling of Abram.
8:9:	Noah, after the deluge, leaves the ark	1657	2347
11:10.	Arphaxad, the son of Shem, is born	1658	2346
12.	Salah, the son of Arphaxad, is born	1693	2311
14.	Eber, the son of Salah, is born . .	1723	2281
16.	Peleg, the son of Eber, is born . .	1757	2247
10:8—11.	Nineveh is built, probably by Nimrod	1771	2233
1:18.	Reu, the son of Peleg, is born . . .	1787	2217
20.	Serug, the son of Reu, is born . . .	1819	2185
22.	Nahor, the son of Serug, is born . .	1849	2155
24.	Terah, the son of Nahor, is born .	1878	2126
9:28,29.	Noah dies, aged 950	2006	1998
11:31,32.	Terah, Abram's father, leaves Ur in Chaldea, and with Abram comes to Haran	2082	1922
12:	Abram, at God's command, leaves Haran, and comes to sojourn in Canaan	2083	1921
	Hence it appears, that Noah lived till within two years of the birth of Abram: and it will be seen, that Isaac was 50 years old when Shem died.
	From the calling of Abram to the Death of Moses.
13:	Lot leaves Abram, and goes to dwell at or near Sodom	2087	1917
14:	The kings of the east wage successful war against the king of Sodom and his confederates, and take Lot captive: but Abram pursues and vanquishes them, rescues Lot: and meets and is blessed by Melchizedek, to whom he gives a tenth of the spoils	2091	1913
16:	Ishmael, Abram's son by Hagar, is born	2093	1911
17:	God covenants with Abram, changes his name to Abraham, institutes circumcision; and promises Isaac by Sarai, whom he calls Sarah .	2106	1898
18:19:	In the same year, Sodom and Gomorrah, &c. are destroyed by fire from heaven, but Lot is rescued in answer to Abraham's intercession	——	——
21:1—7.	Isaac, the child of promise, is born	2107	1897
8—21.	Isaac is weaned, and Ishmael, with Hagar, his mother, is sent away by Abraham	2110	1894
22:	To prove Abraham's faith, God commands him to sacrifice Isaac . .	2132	1872
23:1,2.	Sarah dies, aged 127 years	2144	1860
24:	Isaac marries Rebekah	2147	1857
11:10,11.	Shem, the son of Noah, dies . . .	2158	1846
25:20—26.	Esau and Jacob, twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah, are born	2168	1836
25:7,8.	Abraham dies, aged 175	2182	1822
11:17.	Eber, the fifth from Noah, dies . .	2177	1817
27:28:29:1—14.	Jacob fraudulently obtains the blessing from Isaac: and fleeing from the murderous rage of Esau, being encouraged by a vision at Bethel, he goes into Mesopotamia, to Laban, his mother's brother	2244	1760
29:15—30.	After seven years' service, he marries Leah and Rachel, Laban's daughters, when he was 74 years of age.	2251	1753
31:—33:	Having served Laban 13 years more, and having many sons, and one daughter, he leaves Mesopotamia, and returns to Caanan; in which he was protected against Laban, who pursued him, and encouraged by a divine vision at Peniel, against the fear of Esau, who came to meet him with 400 men; but was reconciled to him	2265	1739
34:	Dinah, Jacob's daughter, is defiled by Shechem, son of Hamor, who, with the men of Shechem, are cruelly and treacherously murdered by Simeon and Levi, Jacob's sons	2272	1732
35:	Benjamin is born, and Rachel dies, near Bethlehem, when Jacob went to pay his vows at Bethel	2272	1732
37:	Joseph, Jacob's elder son by Rachel, is sold by his brethren to the Midianites, who carry him down into Egypt	2275	1729
39:	Joseph, falsely accused by the wife of Potiphar, his master, is committed to prison	2282	1722
35:28,29.	Isaac dies, aged 180	2288	1716
38:	Pharez and Zerah are born of Tamar, by Judah her father-in-law, about	2290	1714
41:	Joseph interpreting Pharaoh's dreams, is made lord of all the land of Egypt	2289	1715
42:	Jacob, pressed by famine, sends his ten sons to buy corn in Egypt; who meet with harsh treatment from Joseph, whom they did not know	2997	1707
43:—46:	Jacob is prevailed on to send Benjamin with his other sons: and Joseph having at length made himself known to his brethren; Jacob, with all his family, go down into Egypt	2298	1706
48:—50:13.	Jacob having blessed his sons, dies in Egypt, aged 147, and is buried in Canaan	2316	1688
50:22—26.	Joseph dies, aged 110, and the book of Genesis closes	2370	1634
Ex. 6:16.	Levi, the grandfather of Moses and Aaron, dies, aged 137	2385	1619
1:8.	The bondage of Israel in Egypt begins, about	2427	1577
6:20.	Aaron is born	2430	1574
2:1—5.	Moses is born, &c.	2433	1571
2:10—25.	Having been brought up by Pharaoh's daughter, he, at the age of 40, attempts to deliver his people: but meeting a repulse, he flees into Midian, where he marries Jethro's daughter; and continues 40 years as a shepherd	2473	1531
Josh. 14:7.	Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, is born	2474	1530
Ex. 3: &c.	God appears to Moses, in a burning bush, and sends him to deliver Israel	2513	491

		A.M.	B. C.
Ex 4:—39:	All the events recorded in the chapters, referred to in the margin, occurred in the same year, except as a change in the beginning of the year (Ex. 12:1.) made the difference of some months	2513	1491
40: Lev. 1:—27: Num. 1:—14:	The tabernacle is set up, the giving of the law is completed, and preparations made, for Israel's immediately marching to possess Canaan; but because of their unbelief and rebellion, they are doomed to continue in the wilderness till 40 years are passed	2514	1490
16:	The rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, about	2533	1471
20:1.	Israel arrives in the wilderness of Zin, and Miriam, the sister of Aaron and Moses, dies	2552	1452
20:—34:	Aaron dies, and the events recorded in the chapters referred to in the margin, occurred in the same year	2552	1452
Deut. 1:—34:	The whole book of Deuteronomy, ending with the death of Moses, bears date	2553	1451
	The books of Moses contain the history of 2552 years complete.
	From the death of Moses to the building of Solomon's temple.
Josh. 1:—5:	Israel, under Joshua, passes over Jordan, keeps the passover in Canaan, and the manna ceases . .	2554	1450
6:—10:	The first victories of Joshua occurred in the same year	——	——
11:	The conquest of Canaan is completed	2558	1446
13:- 17	Joshua, at God's command, begins to divide the land by lot	2559	1445
18:—22:	The tabernacle is set up at Shiloh, the rest of the land is divided; and the Reubenites, &c. are dismissed to their possessions eastward of Jordan	2560	1444
23:	Joshua, now drawing near to the end of his course, assembles the elders and principal persons, and exhorts them to obedience, with earnest encouragements and warnings . .	2577	1427
24:	Having again assembled them, and engaged them to covenant with God, in a most solemn manner, he dies, aged 110	2578	1426
	After the death of Joshua, and of the elders, who with him had seen the works of God for Israel; the people turn away from his worship, and join themselves to idols and idolaters; and are sold into the hands of their enemies. The chronology, however, of the book of Judges, and from the death of Joshua to the advancement of David to the throne, is so extremely intricate, as to particulars, that little certainty can be attained. But, as the years from Israel's departure out of Egypt, to the building of Solomon's temple, are exactly determined; (1 Kings 6:1.) the general chronology from the beginning of the world, till the coming of Christ, is established on the firmest ground; and the uncertainty relates merely to the date of the several incidents, which are recorded in Judges, Ruth, and the first book of Samuel.
Judg. 19: 21:	The Levite's concubine is abused and killed by the men of Gibeah; in consequence of which, the other tribes make war against the Benjamites, almost to the destruction of the whole tribe	2594	1410
1st. 18.	M[illegible]ah makes an image, which the Danites seize on, and so establish idolatry in Dan, in the northern extremity of the land; which continues for a long time	2598	1406
3:1—10.	Israel is sold into the hand of the king of Mesopotamia, but delivered by Othniel, the son of Kenaz, Caleb's brother	2610	1394
11.	After this the land rests during 40 years	2650	1354
3:12—29.	Eglon, king of Moab, begins to oppress Israel	——	——
	After 18 years, Ehud slays Eglon, and delivers Israel	2668	1336
Judg. 3:31.	Shamgar slays 600 Philistines with an ox-goad, about	2680	1324
4:1—3.	Jabin, king of Canaan, oppresses Israel	2690	1314
4:4—24. 5:	They are delivered by Deborah and Barak; and the land has rest for 40 years	2710	1294
6:1—10.	The Midianites begin to oppress Israel	2750	1254
6:11—40.	Gideon is raised up to deliver them,
7: 8:1—27.	and to judge Israel	2757	1247
8:28—32.	Gideon dies: and Abimelech his son
9:1—6.	by a concubine, murders 69 sons of Gideon, (Jotham alone escaping,) and usurps the kingdom over Israel	2797	1207
9:7—57.	He and his adherents quarrel and destroy one another, and he perishes miserably, according to the warning given by Jotham	2800	1204
10:1,2,	Tola judges Israel	2801	1203
3—5.	He dies, and Jair is raised up to be judge	2825	1179
13:24.	Samson is born	2844	1160
10:5.	Jair dies	2846	1158
6—18.	The Ammonites, Philistines, &c. begin to oppress Israel	2847	1157
14: 15:	Samson begins to deliver Israel from the Philistines	2863	1141
11:	Jepthah delivers them from the Ammonites	2865	1139
1 Sam. 1:	Samuel is born	——	——
Judg. 12:1—7.	Jepthah dies	2872	1132
1 Sam. 3:19—21.	Samuel is established as a prophet of the Lord	2876	1128
Judg. 12:8—10.	Ibzan judges Israel, and dies	2879	1125
16:30.	Samson dies, with the Philistines .	2882	1122
1 Sam. 2:—4:	Eli, the high-priest, having judged Israel 40 years, dies: his sons having been slain, and the ark of God taken, by the Philistines	2884	1120
5:6:	The Philistines are constrained by divine judgments, to send back the ark, which is placed at Kirjath-jearim	2889	1115
Judg.12:11,12,	Elon dies	2897	1107
13—15.	Abdon dies	2897	1107
1 Sam. 7:	After 20 years from the death of Eli, the Israelites, having been by Samuel's labours brought to repent and turn to God, are delivered from the Philistines; and he is constituted judge of Israel	2904	1100
	David is born	2919	1085
8:—11:	Samuel, when old, employs his sons as judges under him; but their misconduct gives Israel the occasion of desiring a king: and Saul, whom God had selected and commanded Samuel to anoint, having delivered Jabesh-Gilead in extreme distress, is acknowledged as king	2929	1075
13:—16:	God having rejected Saul, for disobedience, sends Samuel to Bethlehem to anoint David, as the king of Israel	2937	106[illegible]
17:	David conquers and slays Goliath .	2941	1063
18:—31: 2 Sam. 1: 2:1—4.	Saul, having long persecuted David, and committed many atrocious crimes, perishes miserably; and David is anointed and acknowledged king, by the men of Judah	2948	1056
	N. B. Every one who has, in the least degree, turned his thoughts to the subject, will perceive, that this division of the years, from the death of Joshua to the accession of David, is materially different from that of the most of learned chronologers. It is not, therefore, here inserted, in opposition to them; but because the author, feeling dissatisfied with their arrangement, which must be allowed to be very perplexed; endeavoured to lay together the outlines of another plan, in which these years may be arranged. He is very far indeed from being satisfied with his own plan; but he is of opinion, that it may possibly suggest a hint to some other person, engaged in these inquiries, which may eventually lead to some more satisfactory statement, than he has yet seen. It is generally agreed, that Samson and Eli, and Ibzan, Elon and Abdon, were, in some part of the time allotted to each of them, contemporaries; judging Israel, in different districts of the land: and it does not seem improbable, that Elon and Abdon should continue unmolested, at a distance from the Philistines, even during part of the years which intervened between the death of Eli, and the great reformation under Samuel.

		A.M.	B. C.
2 Sam. 2:3—5:5.	After many conflicts David is anointed king over all Israel	2956	1048
5:6—10.	David takes the city of Zion from the Jebusites, and makes Jerusalem the seat of his government . .	2957	1047

13:	Abijah vanquishes Jeroboam, with the slaughter of 500,000 Israelites	3047	957
1 Kings 15:8. 2 Chr. 14:1.	He dies, having reigned three years, and is succeeded by Asa	3049	955
1 Kings 14:20. 15:25.	Jeroboam, of Israel, dies, and is succeeded by his son Nadab	3050	954
1 Kings 15:25—31.	Nadab is slain by Baasha, who usurps the kingdom, and destroys all the family of Jeroboam . . .	3051	953
2 Chr. 14:	Asa, having destroyed idolatry and reformed and fortified his kingdom, is assaulted by Zerah, king of Ethiopia, with an innumerable army; but, trusting in God, he obtains a most decisive victory .	3059	945
	Some place this invasion more early in Asa's reign.
1 Kings 16:6—8.	Baasha of Israel dies, having reigned almost 24 years; and is succeeded by his son Elah	3074	930
16:9—22.	Zimri murders Elah, and succeeds him: but is speedily dethroned by Omri, and perishes miserably . .	3075	929
16:23—29.	Omri of Israel dies, and is succeeded by his son Ahab	3087	917
15:24. 22:41,42.	Asa of Judah, having reigned 41
2 Chr. 16:13, 14. 17:1.	years, dies, and is succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat	3090	914
17:	Jehoshaphat, having demolished the high places and groves, sends Levites with the princes to instruct the people in the law of God; and is remarkably prospered	3092	912
1 Kings 17:	Elijah foretells to Ahab a dreadful famine	3094	910
18:	Elijah having proved, by fire from heaven consuming his sacrifice, that JEHOVAH is the true God; and having slain the prophets of Baal, rain is sent in answer to his prayers	3097	907
20:	Benhadad, king of Syria, besieges Samaria with immense armies: but is repeatedly vanquished by a very small company, and with	3103	901
	immense slaughter	3104	900
21:	Ahab, by Jezebel's means, murders Naboth, and seizes his vineyard; for which he, and Jezebel, and his posterity, are doomed to utter destruction, by the word of Elijah .	3105	899
22:51.	Ahab of Israel, associates his son
2 Kings 3:1.	Ahaziah with him in the kingdom;
	and Jehoshaphat, his son Jehoram	3106	898
1 Kings 22: 2 Chr. 18:	Ahab having formed an alliance and affinity with Jehoshaphat, being encouraged by the false prophets, and rejecting the warning of Michaiah, is slain at Ramoth-gilead; and succeeded by Ahaziah: but God, at the same time, preserves Jehoshaphat from extreme danger	3108	897
2 Kings 1:	Ahaziah, when sick, having received a reproving message from Elijah, sends captains and soldiers to apprehend him, most of whom are slain by fire from heaven; and Ahaziah dies, according to the word of Elijah, and is succeeded by Jehoram	3109	895
2:	In the same year Elijah is taken alive into heaven	——	——
3:	The Moabites revolting from Israel, Jehoshaphat, and Jehoram of Israel, go out against them; and being in extreme danger from want of water, are miraculously delivered by following Elisha's counsel, and obtained a great victory over the Moabites	——	—
2 Chr. 19:20.	Jehoshaphat, having been rebuked by a prophet for his alliance with Ahab, and stirred up to earnestness in reforming his kingdom, is assaulted by a vast army of invaders: but, in answer to his prayer of faith, they destroy each other, and Judah is enriched by the spoils	3112	892
1 Kings 22:50.	Jehoshaphat dies, and is succeeded
2 Kings 8:16—	by his son Jehoram, or Joram,
18. 2 Chr. 21:	(who had reigned four years along
1—7.	with his father,) in the fifth year of Jehoram, or Joram, of Israel.	3115	889
2 Kings 8:18—	Jehoram, of Judah, having murdered
24. 2 Chr. 21:	his brethren, and reigned in a very
4—20.	wicked manner, being instigated by his wife Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, dies miserably; according to a letter left for him by Elijah, and is succeeded by his son Ahaziah	3119	885
2 Kings 9:10.	Jehu, at Ramoth-gilead conspires
2. 2 Chr. 20:	against Jehoram of Israel; slays
22:1—9.	him, with Ahaziah of Judah, near Samaria; and fulfils Elijah's predictions against Jezebel, and Ahab's family, which involved most of Jehoshaphat's descendants, and the royal family of Judah	3120	884
2 Kings 11:1,2.	Athaliah, mother of Ahaziah, and
2 Chr. 22:10—12.	daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, usurps the kingdom of Judah, and

		A.M.	B. C.
	slays all the remnant of the seed-royal, except Joash, an infant, who is preserved in the temple by Jehoshabeath, daughter of Jehoram, and wife to Jehoiada the high-priest	3120	884
2 Kings 11:3—21. 2 Chr. 23:	Jehoiada anoints Joash king, in the seventh year of his age, and puts to death Athaliah and the idolatrous priests; and covenants between the Lord, the king, and the people	3126	878
2 Kings 12:4—16. 2 Chr. 24:4—14.	Jehoash, in the twenty-third year of his reign, gives orders for repairing the temple, which is performed, under the direction of Jehoiada	3148	856
2 Kings 10:31—36. 13:1.	Jehu of Israel dies, having reigned 28 years, and is succeeded by his son Jehoahaz	3148	856
2 Chr. 24:15, 16.	Jehoiada, the high-priest, dies, being 130 years of age; and for his eminent services is honoured by a burial among the kings of Judah	3159	845
24:17—22.	Jehoash, and Judah, after the death of Jehoiada, revolt to idolatry; and the people stone Zechariah the prophet, the son of Jehoiada, by the king's command, in the court of the temple, for his faithful reproofs	3164	840
2 Kings 12:19—21. 2 Chr. 24:23—27.	Jehoash, after great calamities, and dire diseases, is murdered by his servants, after having reigned 40 years; and is succeeded by his son Amaziah	3165	839
2 Kings 13:1—10.	Jehoahaz, of Israel, dies, and is succeeded by his son Jehoash, or Joash	——	——
13:14—19.	Jehoash, of Israel, visits Elisha the prophet, when near to death; and is by him assured of several victories over the Syrians, who at that time oppressed the nation	——	——
14:7—14. Chr. 25:11—24.	Amaziah, of Judah, elated by a victory over the Edomites, challenges Jehoash, of Israel: who overcomes him, takes him prisoner, breaks down the wall of Jerusalem, and plunders the treasures, both of the palace and the temple	3178	826
2 Kings 14:15, 16, 23.	Jehoash, of Israel, dies, fifteen years before Amaziah of Judah; and is succeeded by his son Jeroboam the second	3179	825
14:17—21. 2 Chr. 25:25—28. 26:1—3.	Amaziah, of Judah, is slain by conspirators, and is succeeded by Azariah, or Uzziah	3194	810
2 Kings 14:25—27.	God grants success to Jeroboam, of Israel, according to the word of Jonah, of Gath-hepher, in Galilee, (John 7:52.)	3196	808
4:28, 29.	Jeroboam, of Israel, having reigned 41 years, dies, and an interregnum of eleven or twelve years follows	3220	784
14:29. 15:8, 9.	Zachariah, son of Jeroboam, and great-grandson of Jehu, and the last of his race, (2 Kings 10:30.) is made king, in the 38th year of Azariah, or Uzziah, of Judah . .	3231	773
15:10—15.	Shallum, at the end of the year, dethrones, murders, and succeeds him; but is soon murdered and succeeded by Menahem	3232	772
15:19, 20.	Pul, king of Assyria, invades Israel, and renders Menahem tributary	3233	771
15:17, 22.	Menahem, having perpetrated dire cruelties, and enormous wickedness, dies, and is succeeded by his son Pekahiah	3243	761
15:25.	Pekah, one of Pekahiah's captains, murders and succeeds him . . .	3245	759
15:32—34. 2 Chr. 26:16—23. 27:1.	Azariah, or Uzziah, of Judah, having reigned very prosperously, but at length having been smitten with leprosy, for presuming to burn incense in the temple, dies, after reigning 52 years: and is succeeded by his son Jotham	3246	758
Is. 1:1. Hos. 1: Am. 1:1. Mic. 1:1.	Under Uzziah and Jotham, Isaiah, Hosea, Amos, and Micah, began to prophesy.
2 Kings 15:38. 16:2. 2 Chr. 27:9 28:1.	Jotham, having reigned 16 years, dies, and is succeeded by his son Ahaz	3262	742
2 Kings 16:5. 2 Chr. 28:5, 6. Is. 7:1—9.	Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, of Israel, confederate against Ahaz, to dethrone him, to set aside the family of David, and to appoint a king over Judah of another race: but God, by Isaiah, assures Ahaz, that this design shall not succeed, because Immanuel, the Son of a virgin, should yet spring from the stock of David	3263	741
2 Chr. 28:1—8.	Nevertheless, for the wickedness of Ahaz and Judah, God gives Pekah a great victory, in which 120,000 men of Judah were slain	3264	740
2 Kings 15:30, 31.	Pekah, of Israel, is murdered by Hoshea	3265	739
15:29. 1 Chr. 5:26.	In the days of Pekah, probably towards the close of his reign, Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, carried captive the inhabitants of the western and northern regions of the land.
2 Kings 16:10—16.	Ahaz seeks help from Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, who adds to his distresses; and Ahaz acts more and more impiously	3268	736
17:1.	Hoshea, probably about nine years after he had murdered Pekah, is established as king of Israel . . .	3274	730
17:3.	Shalmaneser, of Assyria, invades Israel, and renders Hoshea tributary to him	3276	728
16:20. 18:1—6. 2 Chr. 28:27. 29:—31: Is. 14: 28.	Ahaz dies, and is succeeded in Judah, by his son Hezekiah; who immediately exerts himself to destroy idolatry, and to re-establish the worship of Jehovah; and celebrates a most remarkable passover, inviting the Israelites to join in it	3278	726
2 Kings 17:4, 5. 18:9.	Hoshea, of Israel, relying on the king of Egypt, refuses to pay tribute to Shalmaneser, and is taken captive; and Shalmaneser lays siege to Samaria	3279	725
17:6—41. 18: 10—12.	Samaria is taken by Salmaneser; and the ten tribes, for their sins, are carried captive, and dispersed in distant countries; and their land is peopled by colonies of other nations, from whom, and from some Israelites incorporated with them, sprang the Samaritans . .	3283	721
18:13—16.	Sennacherib, king of Assyria, invades Judah, but, appeased by a tribute, recedes	3291	713
20: 2 Chr. 32: 24. Is. 38:	About the same time Hezekiah is sick, nigh to death; but he is restored by miracle; and deliverance from the Assyrians is promised to him	——	——
2 Kings 20:12—20. Is. 39:	Hezekiah, having offended, in his conduct towards the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, the Babylonish captivity is predicted . . .	3292	712
2 Kings 18:17—37. 19: 2 Chr. 32:1—23. Is. 36:37:	Sennacherib again invades Judah; takes many cities; prepares to besiege Jerusalem; and sends menacing and blasphemous messages and letters to Hezekiah: but in answer to the prayers of Hezekiah and Isaiah, and the remnant of pious Jews, his army is cut off by an angel; and soon after he is murdered at Nineveh, in the temple of his idol, by his own sons . . .	3294	710
2 Kings 20:20, 21. 21:1. 2 Chr. 32:33. 33:1.	Hezekiah dies, and is succeeded by his son Manasseh, aged only 12 years	3306	698
2 Kings 21:2, &c. 2 Chr. 33: 2—11.	Manasseh reigns most wickedly, beyond all who preceded him; till he is carried captive to Babylon.	3328	676
	Or rather perhaps about	3344	660
33:12—20.	Having deeply repented, and being restored to his kingdom; he supports the worship of God, till his death, having reigned in all 52 years	3361	643
2 Kings 21:19—26. 22:1. 2 Chr. 33:21—25. 34:1	His son Amon, who succeeds him, aged 22 years, persisting in wickedness, is slain (after reigning two years) by his servants, and succeeded by his son Josiah, being only 8 years old	3363	641
34:3—7.	Josiah begins to reform Judah and Israel	3374	630
Jer. 1:2.	Jeremiah enters on his prophetical office, being then a young man .	3375	629
2 Kings 22:3—20. 2 Chr. 34:8—22.	Josiah gives orders for repairing the temple: when Hilkiah, the high-priest, finding the book of the law, in the most holy place, brings it to Josiah, and reads it to him; by which he, being greatly alarmed, sends to Huldah the prophetess, who denounces the desolations of

		A.M.	B. C.
	Jerusalem and Judah; but not in Josiah's time	3381	623
2 Kings 23:1—20. 2 Chr. 34:23—28.	In the same year he proceeds with and completes his reformation; and fulfils the predictions delivered concerning him, above 300 years before, (1 Kings 13:2—32.)	—	—
2 Kings 23:21—24. 2 Chr. 35:1—19.	He celebrates the passover with extraordinary zeal and solemnity	3382	622
Nah. 1:—3:	Nineveh is taken and desolated by the Medes and Chaldeans, according to the predictions of Nahum	3392	612
2 Kings 23:29, 30. 2 Chr. 35: 20—27. 36:2.	Josiah, being 37 years of age, and having reigned 31 years, is slain in battle against Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt; and greatly lamented by Judah and by Jeremiah.—The people of the land make Jehoahaz, Josiah's second son, king in his stead.—Zephaniah prophesied during the reign of Josiah, (Zeph. 1:1.)	3394	610
2 Kings 23:31—35. 2 Chr. 36:2—4.	After three months Pharaoh-necho carries Jehoahaz captive into Egypt; and makes Jehoiakim, Josiah's eldest son, king over Judah	—	—
	During the reign of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah continues to prophesy: and Urijah also prophesies, who is slain by Jehoiakim. (Jer. 26:23.) Probably Habakkuk prophesied at the same time.
	Nebuchadnezzar is associated with Nabopollazzar his father, king of Babylon, in the kingdom	3397	607
2 Kings 24:1. 2 Chr. 36:6,7. Dan. 1:1—3.	Nebuchadnezzar makes war on Jehoiakim, and renders him tributary. At this time Daniel and his friends were led captive; and many of the sacred vessels of the temple were carried to Babylon: and from this year the principal computation of the seventy years' captivity begins	3398	606
	Nabopollazzar dies, and Nebuchadnezzar succeeds to the whole authority	3399	605
2 Kings 24:1.	Jehoakim revolts from Nebuchadnezzar	3401	603
Dan. 2:	In the same year Daniel reveals and interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, as predicting the four great monarchies, the Chaldean, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman; and the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which destroyed and dissipated the image; denoting the kingdom of Christ, and its final universal prevalence. In consequence, Daniel and his friends are greatly preferred	3401	603
5:31.	Cambyses, called also Darius the Median, is born	3403	601
2 Kings 24:2—6. 2 Chr. 36:8. Jer. 22: 18,19. 36:30.	Jehoiakim is slain, and succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, or Jeconias, or Coniah	3104	600
	In the same year Cyrus, the Persian, is born	—	—
2 Kings 24:8—16. 2 Chr. 36:9,10. Jer. 24:1.	Jeconiah, with a great number of the Jews, is carried captive to Babylon; and Zedekiah, his uncle, the youngest son of Josiah, is made king in his stead	3406	598
	This may be considered as another date of the seventy years' captivity. Ezekiel, who was at this time carried captive, dates the years of the captivity from it.
Ez. 1:1.	Ezekiel is called to the prophetical office	3409	595
2 Kings 24:20. 2 Chr. 36:13. Jer. 52:3. Ez. 17:12—20. 21: 22—27.	Zedekiah, rebelling against Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he had sworn fidelity, confederates with Pharaoh-hophra, king of Egypt	3412	592
2 Kings 25:1. Jer. 39:1. 52:4.	Nebuchadnezzar lays siege to Jerusalem	3414	590
Ez. 24:2. Jer. 37:4—11.	He drives back Pharaoh-hophra, who comes to help Zedekiah	3415	589
2 Kings 25:2—10. 2 Chr. 36:17—21. Jer. 39: 52:	Nebuchadnezzar takes Jerusalem; utterly destroys it, with the temple; slays Zedekiah's sons before his eyes, puts out his eyes, and carries him captive to Babylon	3416	588
	This occurred 468 years after David's accession to the throne: 388 years after the revolt of the ten tribes from Rehoboam; and 134 years after the ruin of the kingdom of Israel.—About this time Obadiah prophesied against the insulting Edomites. The 137th Psalm was probably written about the same period.
	From the beginning of the captivity, till the close of the scriptural history, and canon.
Jer. 52:30.	Nebuzaradan carries captive the scattered remnant of the Jews	3420	584
Dan. 3:	Nebuchadnezzar requires all his officers, &c. to worship a golden image, which he had set up: but Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, magnanimously refuse: they are cast into the fiery furnace, and are miraculously preserved	3421	583
Ez. 29:17—20	Nebuchadnezzar takes Tyre, after a siege of 13 years; and the spoil of Egypt, which he next invaded, is promised to him as his wages	3432	572
Dan. 4:1—27.	Being rendered insolent by prosperity, he is warned by a dream of a dire calamity, which was coming upon him; which dream Daniel interprets	3435	569
28—32.	The dream is fulfilled in his most extraordinary insanity	3436	568
33—37.	At the end of seven years, he recovers his senses, is restored to his authority, and adores and honours the God of heaven	3443	561
2 Kings 25:27—30. Jer. 52: 31—34.	He dies, and is succeeded by Evil-merodach, who releases Jehoiachin, in the 37th year of his captivity, and treats him with kindness	3444	560
	Evil-merodach is slain, and succeeded by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law	3446	558
	In the same year, Cyrus, the Persian, joins Cyaxares, the Mede, against Babylon, being about 41 years of age	—	—
	Cyrus, as commander of the Medes and Persians, slays in battle Neriglissar, and soon after, his successor, Laborosarchad	3448	556
Dan. 7:	Belshazzar, the son of Evil-merodach, succeeds to the throne of Babylon; and in the same year Daniel has his vision of the four beasts; as emblematic of the four great empires, subverted and succeeded by the kingdom of Christ, according to Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image, &c. (Dan. 2.)	3449	55
8:	Daniel has the vision of the ram and the he-goat, &c. as emblematic of the Medo-Persian empire, subverted by Alexander the great, and the Grecian empire, under his successors, and many subsequent events	3451	553
	Cyrus, having conquered a great part of Asia, besieges Belshazzar in Babylon	3463	541
5:	While Belshazzar celebrates a licentious feast; and blasphemes the God of heaven, by profaning the sacred vessels in honour of his idols; a handwriting on the wall terrifies him, which Daniel interprets to denounce his immediate ruin, and the subversion of his kingdom by the Medes and Persians: and in that night Cyrus takes Babylon, slays Belshazzar, and transfers the kingdom to Cyaxares, his uncle, called in Scripture, Darius the Mede.—Thus the Medo-Persian empire is established; being the breast and arms of silver, in Nebuchadnezzar's image; and the bear in Daniel's vision (Dan. 2: 7:)	3466	538
6:	Daniel, being greatly preferred by Darius, is envied and hated by his nobles; and by their artful devices is cast into the den of lions; whence he is miraculously delivered	3467	537
9:	About this time he had the vision of the seventy weeks.
2 Chr. 36:22, 23. Ezra 1:1. 5:13—15. 7:6. Is. 45:1—6.	Darius dies, and is succeeded by Cyrus, who, in the same year, proclaims liberty to the captive Jews; permits and encourages

		A.M.	B. C.
	them to rebuild the temple and city; and restores the sacred vessels. In consequence of this proclamation, a remnant of Jews go to Jerusalem, being assisted by their brethren and by others.—This terminates the seventy years' captivity, from the third of Jehoiakim, when Daniel was carried captive to Babylon	3468	536
Ezra 3:1—7	The remnant of Jews, having arrived at Jerusalem, set up an altar, begin to observe their solemn feasts, and prepare to rebuild the temple	3469	535
8—13.	They lay the foundation of the temple, with mingled tears and acclamations of praise	3470	534
Dan. 10:—12:	About this time Daniel had his last vision.
	The Samaritans, bribing the courtiers of Cyrus, obstruct the work	3471	533
	Cyrus dies, aged 70, and is succeeded by his son, Cambyses, or Ahasuerus	3474	530
	Cambyses, after subjecting Egypt, dies, and Smerdis, the Magian, called in Scripture Artaxerxes, usurps the throne of Persia . . .	3482	522
Ezra 4:7—24.	The Samaritans write to him against the Jews rebuilding the temple, and obtain a decree, forbidding them to proceed	3483	521
	In the same year Smerdis, or Artaxerxes, is slain, and Darius Hystaspis ascends the throne. About this time, the Persian kings, making Susa their capital, neglect Babylon, which begins to decay
Ezra 5:1,2. 6: 14. Hag. 1: 2: Zech. 3: 4:	Zerubbabel and Jeshua, excited by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, set forward the building of the temple	3484	520
Ezra 5:2—17.	The Samaritans, and their associates, again attempt to hinder the work, but are made to desist by a decree of Darius.—About this time Haggai prophesies, that the glory of this temple shall exceed that of the former temple	3486	518
	The Babylonians having revolted from Darius, are reduced, and the high walls of Babylon are demolished	3487	517
6:14—22.	The temple is finished and dedicated	3489	515
	Darius Hystaspis, after a prosperous reign, dies, and is succeeded by his son Xerxes	3518	486
	Xerxes destroys the celebrated temple of Bel, at Babylon; which further tends to the decay of that city	3526	478
	After an inglorious reign, especially in an unsuccessful war, with immense forces, against the Greeks, which so weakened his kingdom, as to prepare the way for its subversion, Xerxes is slain, by the treachery of Artabanus	3539	465
	Artaxerxes, the youngest son of Xerxes, having been led, by the calumnies of Artabanus, to slay his eldest brother Darius, ascends the throne; though he had another elder brother (Hystaspis) at a distance; and to secure himself slays Artabanus	3540	464
Esth 1:1.	This Ahasuerus is supposed to be the Ahasuerus mentioned in Esther.
1:	Being fully established in the throne, he makes a great feast for his nobles; and divorces Vashti, his queen, for disobeying his orders .	3542	462
2:	Esther, the Jewess, pleases the king, and is made queen instead of Vashti	3546	458
Ezra 7:	Ezra the priest, a learned scribe, obtains a commission from Artaxerxes, to go as governor to Jerusalem, to reform and settle the state of the nation.—From this decree, the date of Daniel's 70 weeks is supposed to begin, (Dan. 9:24—27.)	3547	457
Esth. 2:21-23.	About the same time, Mordecai discovers the treason of Bigtha and Teresh	3547	457
Ezra 8:—10.	Ezra, arriving at Jerusalem, with priests, Levites, and a large company, and a considerable treasure, separates the Jews from their heathen wives, which they had married contrary to the law of Moses	3548	456
	After this, he continued in authority during several years, of which there is no history extant.
Esth. 3:	Mordecai, refusing to bow in adoration to Haman, the Agagite; Haman, in revenge, plots the destruction of all the Jews, throughout the whole kingdom of Persia	3550	454
	And obtains from Ahasuerus a decree for that purpose	3551	453
4:—10.	This project is defeated by means of Esther, and ends in the destruction of Haman and his family, and of the enemies of the Jews; in Mordecai's advancement to the highest authority under the king, and in the great prosperity of the Jews; in remembrance of which, the feast of Purim is instituted, which is observed by the Jews to this day	3552	452
Neh. 1:—4:	Nehemiah is sent governor to Jerusalem, with extensive powers, and a commission to build the walls of the city; which he immediately attempts, and effects notwithstanding great opposition	3559	445
5:—11:	He proceeds prosperously to execute his commission; to repeople Jerusalem; and to reform both the civil and ecclesiastical state of the nation	3560	444
13:6.	He goes to the Persian court . . .	3571	433
	But returning, as it is supposed, with a renewed commission, he finds that many corruptions had crept in during his absence; and proceeds zealously to enforce reformation; in effecting which he banished the grandson of Eliashib, the high-priest, who had married the daughter of Sanballat, the Heronite, who in consequence excited Sanballat and the Samaritans to build a temple on mount Gerizim, in opposition to that at Jerusalem; which augmented and perpetuated the enmity between the Jews and the Samaritans . .	3572	432
	Some, however, place this last act of Nehemiah much later.—In the time of Nehemiah, it is recorded, that Ezra prepared and set forth a correct edition of the Scriptures, as extant at that time. Being himself an inspired writer, he no doubt did this under a special superintendency of the Holy Spirit: and it is evident, that our Lord and his apostles sanctioned the sacred volume, which was edited at this time, as "the oracles of God;" with no other variation, as far as it can now be found, than the insertion of the book of Nehemiah, and the prophecy of Malachi, after Ezra's decease. Some think, that Malachi prophesied towards the end of the time, during which Nehemiah was governor; others think that he was raised up, soon after his removal.
	Plato the celebrated philosopher is born	3576	428
	Artaxerxes dies, and, after some bloody contests, Darius Nothus succeeds to the throne of Persia	3581	423
Mal. 1:—4:	Malachi delivers his prophecy . .	3584	420
	According to some chronologers, Nehemiah banishes the grandson of Eliashib, the high-priest, &c.	3595	409
	Here the Old Testament closes, and there is no further scriptural information, till the time of Zecharias and Elizabeth, the parents of John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Saviour.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

From the close of the Old Testament to the coming of Christ.	A.M.	B.C.
Darius Nothus dies, and is succeeded by Artaxerxes Mnemon	3599	405
Aristotle the philosopher is born	3620	384
Johanan, high-priest of the Jews, kills his brother Joshua in the temple, for which the nation is fined by the Persians	3638	366
Artaxerxes Mnemon dies	3645	359
Ochus succeeds him in the kingdom of Persia	3646	358
Alexander the great is born in Macedonia	3648	356
Plato the philosopher dies, aged 80. He is supposed to have seen and studied the Hebrew Scriptures; and to have taken many things from them	3656	348
Ochus, king of Persia, is murdered, and succeeded by Arogus	3666	338
Arogus is murdered, and succeeded by Darius Codomannus, the last king of the Medo-Persian empire	3668	336
In the same year, Philip, king of Macedon, is murdered; and his son, Alexander the great succeeds him in the throne	—	—
Alexander the great is appointed general of the Greeks against the Persians	3669	335
He passes over into Asia, and gains a victory over Darius, at Granicus	3670	334
He reduces all Asia Minor, and gains another great victory over Darius, at Issus	3671	333
He takes Tyre and Gaza, and visits Jerusalem peaceably, (Note, Dan. 8:5—7.)	3672	332
With inexpressible celerity, he passes the Euphrates and the Tigris, and obtains a decisive victory over Darius, at Arbela	3673	331
Soon after, Darius is slain; and the Medo-Persian empire is terminated, and succeeded by the Grecian, or Macedonian; as denoted by the belly and thighs of brass, in Nebuchadnezzar's dream; (Dan. 2:32—39.) the leopard in Daniel's first vision, (Dan. 7:6.) and the he-goat in his second, (Dan. 8:5—8.)	3674	330
Alexander the great dies at Babylon; whose vast dominions and conquests, after many dreadful conflicts between his captains, form four kingdoms, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt	3681	323
Ptolemy, afterwards called Soter, gains possession of Jerusalem, and carries a great number of Jews into Egypt, where they form a colony at Alexandria	3684	320
This year, Jaddua, the high-priest dies, (Neh. 12: 22.) and is succeeded by Onias	—	—
Onias dies, and is succeeded by Simon the Just	3704	300
About the same time Seleucus builds Antioch in Syria, (Acts 11:19—26. 13:1.)	—	—
Epicurus begins to teach his profligate philosophy	3694	310
The dominions of Alexander are formed into four kingdoms; Egypt, under Ptolemy Soter; Macedonia, under Cassander; Thrace, under Lysimachus; and Syria, with all the east, under Seleucus. Thus Daniel's visions were exactly fulfilled. (Note, Dan. 7:6. 8:8.)—The Jews, however, had little concern, except with the kingdoms of Egypt and Syria; between which their country was situated. At this time they formed a part of Ptolemy's dominion.	3703	301
Seleucus, king of Syria, builds Seleucia, on the Tigris, which tended greatly to depopulate Babylon	3711	293
Simon the just dies, and is succeeded in the high-priesthood, by his brother Eleazar	3713	291
The lighthouse, or watchtower, of Pharos, near Alexandria, one of the wonders of the world, is finished by Ptolemy Soter	3720	284
In the same year Ptolemy Soter dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus	—	—
Seleucus, king of Syria, is slain, and succeeded by his son, Antiochus Soter	3725	279
A multitude of emigrated Gauls, after many defeats and disasters, pass over out of Greece into Asia Minor; and there obtain a settlement in the country afterwards called Galatia	3727	277
About this time, the Hebrew Scriptures began to be translated into Greek; for the benefit of the dispersed Jews, who spake that language; which opened the way for learned heathens to become acquainted with them	—	—
Antiochus Soter, of Syria, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Antiochus Theus	3743	261
Manasseh, the high-priest, who had succeeded Simon the just, dies; and is succeeded by Onias, the son of Simon	3753	251
Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Euergetes	3757	247
Antiochus Theus, king of Syria, is poisoned by his wife Laodice, and succeeded by his son, Seleucus Ceraunicus	3758	246
Seleucus Callinicus is vanquished, and taken prisoner by the Parthians	3774	230
He dies in Parthia, and is succeeded by his son, Seleucus Ceraunus	3779	225
Who is poisoned by his attendants	3781	223
And is succeeded by his brother Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the great	—	—
Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philopater	3783	22
Who, having obtained a great victory over Antiochus, king of Syria, obtains possession of Judea; and coming to Jerusalem, attempts to enter the holy of holies, in the temple; but is opposed by the high-priest, and retires with horror of mind, but with implacable hatred of the Jews	3787	21
Having made peace with Antiochus, he attempts to destroy all the Jews at Alexandria; but fails of his purpose	3788	216
Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Epiphanes, being only five years of age	3800	204
Antiochus, of Syria, combining with Philip of Macedonia, to divide Ptolemy Epiphanes' dominions between them; the Egyptians crave the assistance of the Romans for their infant-king, who take him under their protection	3802	202
This seems to have been the first entrance of the Romans, (the fourth kingdom, in Daniel's prophecies,) into the dominion of the Macedonian, or Grecian empire, which was the third kingdom.
The Romans send M. Emilius Lepidus into Egypt, to protect Ptolemy	3803	201
Simon, the high-priest, dies, and is succeeded by his son, Onias III.	3809	195
Antiochus the great passes over into Europe, to join Philip, king of Macedon, against the Romans	3812	192
He is driven back with disgrace into Asia, by the Romans	3813	191
Lucius Scipio, the Roman consul, follows him, and by a complete victory, compels him to make peace, on most ignominious and ruinous conditions.—Thus the fourth kingdom, in Daniel's prophecies, gradually subverts the third, (Dan. 2:33—40. 7:7—19.)	3814	190
Antiochus the great is slain, and succeeded by his son, Seleucus Philopater	3816	186
Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, is slain, and succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philometor, aged only six years	3824	180
Seleucus Philopater dies, and is succeeded by his brother, Antiochus Epiphanes	3828	176
Jason buys of him the high-priesthood, and supplants his brother Onias	3829	175
Jason introduces idolatrous observances into the worship at the temple	3830	174
Menelaus, Jason's brother, supplants him, by buying the high-priesthood of Antiochus	3832	172
Onias, the elder brother of Jason and Menelaus, is put to death at Antioch: and Lysimachus, Menelaus's deputy, is slain in a tumult at Jerusalem	3833	171
Antiochus Epiphanes begins to persecute the Jews; putting a stop to the daily sacrifice, and the worship at the temple; and building a fortress on mount Acra, to curb the inhabitants of Jerusalem	3836	168
But Mattathias and his sons take arms against him	—	—
The Romans, having conquered Perseus, the king of Macedon, terminate the kingdom	3837	167
Seven brethren, and their mother after them, are most cruelly martyred, because they refused to commit idolatry, or violate the law of Moses, at the command of Antiochus; and the persecution is carried on with great vehemence	—	—
Mattathias being dead, his son Judas succeeds him in command, and obtains most signal victories over the lieutenants of Antiochus Epiphanes	3838	166
Judas vanquishes Lysias, Antiochus's deputy, recovers Jerusalem, and restores the daily sacrifice, and the worship at the temple	3839	165
Antiochus Epiphanes dies, and is succeeded by his son, Antiochus Eupator	3840	164
Judas, after several other successes against the surrounding enemies of the Jews, vanquishes Lysias a second time; and compels him to terms of peace	3841	163
Menelaus, the usurping high-priest is slain, and succeeded by Alcimus	—	—
Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopater, slays Antiochus Eupator, and succeeds to the throne of Syria	3842	162
Nicanor, sent by Demetrius against the Jews, is slain with all his army. Bacchides, sent to avenge this blow, slays Judas, and grievously oppresses the Jews.—Judas is succeeded by his brother, Jonathan	3843	161
Alcimus, the high-priest, dies, and Bacchides leaving Jerusalem, the Jews enjoy peace	3845	159
Bacchides, returning into Judea, is routed by Jonathan, and Simon his brother; and makes peace with the Jews	3846	158

	A.M.	B. C.
Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabæus, is made high-priest, by Alexander Balas, who claimed the kingdom of Syria against Demetrius: and whom Jonathan greatly assisted	3851	153
From this period, the high-priesthood continued in the Asmodean, or Maccabean family, till the time of Herod the great.
Demetrius is vanquished and slain by Alexander Balas, who succeeds him	3854	150
Onias, the son of Onias, who had been high-priest, builds a temple in Egypt, like that at Jerusalem	3855	149
Jonathan, after various successes, in support of the son of Alexander Balas, against his competitor Demetrius, the son of him who was slain by Alexander Balas, is treacherously murdered by Tryphon: and is succeeded in the high-priesthood by his brother, Simon; who, declaring for Demetrius, is made also sovereign ruler of Judea	3861	143
He takes the fortress, which Antiochus Epiphanes had erected to curb Jerusalem, demolishes it, and levels the hill on which it stood	3862	142
The sovereignty of Judea is confirmed to Simon, and to his posterity, by the unanimous consent of the Jews, in a general assembly at Jerusalem: and he frees them from all tribute to any foreign prince, and effects, in many things, a reformation among them	3863	141
Simon is murdered, with two of his sons, by Ptolemy, his son-in-law; and is succeeded by his son John, surnamed Hyrcanus	3869	135
John Hyrcanus asserts his independency against the Syrians; and destroys the temple on mount Gerizim	3874	130
He conquers the Idumæans, or Edomites, and, compelling them to be circumcised, incorporates them among the Jews. From this time the name of Idumæans is scarcely mentioned in history	3875	129
Aristobulus and Antigonus, sons of John Hyrcanus, lay siege to Samaria	3894	110
Antiochus Cyricenus, at that time king of Syria, (that kingdom being enfeebled by perpetual conflicts with the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, by incessant internal contests and revolutions, and by the overwhelming power of the Romans,) in vain attempts to relieve Samaria, which falls into the hands of Hyrcanus, with all Galilee	3895	109
Hyrcanus, hitherto supported by the sect of the Pharisees, recently formed among the Jews; forsakes them, and joins the Sadducees, their opponents	3896	108
He dies, and is succeeded by Aristobulus, his eldest son; who first took the insignia and name of king	3897	107
Aristobulus, having conquered Iturea, and killed his brother Antigonus, dies, and is succeeded by Alexander Jannæus, his brother	3898	106
Pompey and Cicero, celebrated Romans, are born in the same year
Alexander Jannæus, after various transactions, some successful, and others unsuccessful, is opposed by a mutiny of the Jews at the temple, during the feast of tabernacles; of whom he slays 600 men	3909	95
He subdues the inhabitants of Gilead and the Moabites	3910	94
Having ill success, in a war against Obodas, an Arabian king, the Jews make war against him. This war continued six years	3913	91
Alexander Jannæus dies, after many successes and cruelties, and is succeeded in the regal authority by his wife Alexandra, who, conciliating the Pharisees, reigns peaceably to the end of her life	3925	79
She makes her eldest son, Hyrcanus, high-priest	3926	78
The Pharisees, managing the affairs of Alexandra, grievously oppress their opponents	3927	77
The Romans greatly extend their conquests, both in Asia and Africa, and reduce many regions into the form of provinces	3928	76
Herod the great is born	3932	72
Alexandra dies. Hyrcanus seizes the kingdom: but is soon deprived of it by Aristobulus, his younger brother	3934	70
Pompey the great, an eminent Roman commander, after many conquests, reduces Syria into the form of a province: thus terminating the Macedonian or Grecian kingdom, and establishing that of the Romans, the fourth great monarchy in Daniel's prophecies	3939	65
Pompey, appealed to by Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and promising to arbitrate between them, discovers that Aristobulus is preparing for war; and in consequence marches against Jerusalem, and takes it, after a siege of three months, and restores Hyrcanus.—At this time he enters into the temple, and into the holy of holies, and many have remarked, that he never after prospered in any undertaking. From this period, the Jews became dependent on the Romans; after having been, for a long time, independent, by reason of the weakness of the Syrian and Egyptian kings. —In the same year Augustus Cesar is born	3941	63
Aristobulus, and Alexander his son, raise disturbances in Judea, but are vanquished by Gabinius, a Roman commander	3947	57
Crassus, the Roman general, plunders the temple at Jerusalem	3950	54
He is vanquished and slain by the Parthians	3951	53
Julius Cesar prevails against Pompey, at Pharsalia: Pompey flees to Egypt, and is there treacherously murdered	3956	48
Antipater, an Edomite, by the favour of Cesar, whom he had assisted in Egypt, is placed ruler over Judea, nominally under Hyrcanus, but in fact, as superseding him. He constitutes his son Herod governor of Galilee	3957	47
Julius Cesar at this time being made perpetual dictator, the empire of the Cesars commences
Antipater, by permission from the Romans, rebuilds the walls of Jerusalem	3960	44
Julius Cesar is assassinated in the senate
Antipater is poisoned: but his sons, Phasael and Herod, revenge his death by that of the murderer	3961	43
Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, excites disturbances in Judea; but is vanquished by Herod	3962	42
The Parthians, having obtained many advantages against the Romans, slay Phasael, make Hyrcanus prisoner, and appoint Antigonus king of Judea; but Herod, fleeing to Rome, is there constituted king by the ruling party	3964	40
Herod besieges Jerusalem	3965	39
After many losses, and successes, he takes the city, and is established in the royal authority, being by birth an Edomite, and a Jew only as proselyted	3967	37
Herod makes Anamelus, an obscure person, high-priest instead of Antigonus, which occasions disturbances	3968	36
Deposing him, he appoints Aristobulus, brother of Mariamne his wife to the high-priesthood. The succession belonged to him, but he was no more than 17 years of age. Herod not long after murdered him	3969	35
Being in danger of a capital punishment for this murder, he appeases Mark Anthony, or rather Cleopatra, his infamous paramour, with large presents	3970	34
At the instance of Mark Anthony, he attacks and subdues Malchus, king of Arabia Petrea	3973	31
Octavianus, (afterwards Augustus Cesar,) having vanquished Mark Anthony, Herod with much difficulty makes his peace with him	3974	30
Herod, in a furious rage and jealousy, puts to death Mariamne, his beloved wife, who was descended from the Maccabees	3975	29
And, the next year, Alexandra, her mother	3976	28
To conciliate the Romans, he occasionally conforms to heathen observances, which greatly disgusts the Jews	3978	26
He rebuilds Samaria and calls it Sebaste, from the Greek word Sebastos, or august; which was the title given to the Roman Emperor, or assumed by him	3979	25
In the same year he takes great care to relieve the Jews, under the pressure of a grievous famine, which conciliated their minds towards him
Augustus Cesar acquires absolute dominion over the whole Roman empire	3980	24
In the same year, Herod completes for himself a stately palace on Mount Zion
He builds Herodium	3981	23
He begins to build Cesarea, which was not finished till the end of twelve years	3982	22
Being more and more favoured by Augustus, he prepares to rebuild, or thoroughly to repair and beautify, the temple	3985	19
After two years' preparation, he enters on the work	3987	17
Having finished Cesarea, (before called Straton's tower,) he names it in honour of his patron Cesar Augustus	3994	10
He puts to death the two sons, whom he had by Mariamne, on a frivolous accusation of treason	3998	6
In this year, the angel Gabriel promised to Zacharias a son, by his wife Elizabeth, whom he must call John
The same angel shows the Virgin Mary, that the Messiah should be born of her	3999	5
The census, or register of estates and families throughout Judea, was made at this time: but the taxes were not imposed or collected till some years after. (Note, Luke 2:2.)
Christ is born at Bethlehem	4000	4
In the same year, Herod in vain attempts to murder the infant Saviour, but cruelly massacred the male children near Bethlehem. He puts his son Antipater to death, on an accusation of treason and parricide, and five days afte dies himself in the most dreadful manner

	A.M.	B. C.
Archelaus succeeds Herod his father, in Judea, Idumæa, and Samaria; Herod Antipas in Galilee and Petræa; and Philip, in Auronitis, Trachonitis, Paneas, and Balanæa.—Joseph and Mary, with the child Jesus, returning out of Egypt, settle at Nazareth in Galilee	4002	2
The Christian Era begins, 4 years after the real time at which our Lord was born	4004
Archelaus, the son of Herod, having been convicted of maleadministration in his government, is deposed, and banished into Gaul: and Judea is made a province of the Roman empire, by Quirinius, or Cyrenius, governor of Syria, who first levied the taxes, according to the census, or register, before made; and Coponius is placed over it. Thus the sceptre was departing from Judah, for Shiloh was come, though not manifested	4012	A. D. 8
In this year, Jesus went up to Jerusalem, and at the temple sat in the midst of the teachers of the law, both hearing them and asking them questions
Marcus Ambivius succeeds Coponius, as procurator of Judea	4014	10
Tiberius is admitted to share the authority with Augustus, whence his 15 years is dated, (Luke 3:1.)	4016	12
Annius Rufus succeeds Marcus Ambivius	4017	13
Augustus Cesar dies, and is succeeded by Tiberius, his adopted son;	4018	14
Who appoints Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea	4019	15
Valerius Gratus removes Annas, the high-priest, and substitutes Ismael, the son of Fabus	4027	23
Eleazar, the son of Annas, is made high-priest instead of Ismael	4028	24
Simon, the son of Camith, is made high-priest, in the place of Eleazar	4029	25
Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, the son of Annas, is made high-priest, instead of Simon	4030	26
Pontius Pilate is made procurator of Judea; and in the same year John begins his ministry	4031	27
Not long after, our Lord is baptized by John, and after his temptation in the wilderness, begins to exercise his public ministry, being 30 years of age. (Luke 3:23. John 1:29—51.)
Christ is crucified, under Pontius Pilate, when Tiberius was the Roman emperor	4037	33
Tiberius dies, and is succeeded by Caligula	4041	37
Caligula makes Herod Agrippa, grandson of king Herod by his son Aristobulus, and nephew to Herod Antipas, who beheaded John the Baptist, and brother to Herodias, and father to king Agrippa, tetrarch, or king, of Galilee	4042	38
Caligula dies, and is succeeded by Claudius	4045	41
Claudius makes Herod Agrippa king of Judea, in addition to his former territories	4046	42
Herod puts James, the brother of John, to death, and purposes to kill Peter also, who is miraculously preserved: and soon after, Herod, smitten by an angel, is eaten with worms, and dies	4048	44
Claudius dies, and is succeeded by Nero	4058	54
Felix is appointed governor of Judea, about	4059	55

Otho murders himself, and is succeeded by Vitellius;	4074	70
Who is speedily cut off, and succeeded by Vespasian;
In the beginning of whose reign Jerusalem is taken by the Romans, under Titus, the son of Vespasian, and all the awful predictions of our Lord, as well as those of the ancient prophets, are exactly accomplished.—The city is desolated; the temple destroyed, so that not one stone was left on another; 1,100,000 persons perished miserably in the siege; and the remnant of the Jews are scattered into all nations, and dispersed among them.
Vespasian dies, and is succeeded by his son Titus	4083	79
Titus dies, and is succeeded by Domitian, his brother	4085	81
Domitian is slain, and succeeded by Nerva	4100	96
Nerva dies, and is succeeded by Trajan	4102	98
Trajan dies, and is succeeded by Adrian	4121	117

N. B. This carries on the chronology of the Roman emperors considerably beyond the termination of the New Testament: and therefore it is here closed.—It may be observed by the reader, that the author has not attempted to arrange into a table, either the date of our Lord's discourses and miracles, &c. or the history contained in the Acts of the Apostles. In fact, he is not competent to add any thing to what has been already advanced in the notes: a table on these particulars must have assumed an appearance of certainty, or at least satisfaction, as to the date of the several events, which he does not possess: those to whom such matters appear important, will find this already done by many writers, according to their several computations, with sufficient exactness: and after all, to the generality of readers, the precise time when this or that sermon was preached, or miracle wrought, or epistle written, is not a matter of very great consequence. At least, the author, probably for want of the proper turn of mind, or ability, must be permitted to devolve this service on others; as incapable of performing it to his own satisfaction.

BROWN'S CONCORDANCE

TO THE

OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT.

TO THE READER.

1 THAT this Concordance doth not pretend to comprehend more than any other larger ones, but to contain the principal substance of them all in little room.

2. By observing one or more principal words of any remembered text, and what are the three first letters of them, and searching under answerable words in the Concordance, the sentence will be found.

3. The original words, whether nouns or verbs, are marked in CAPITAL letters, and those derived from them come after in Italics.

4. Where words are found in many places, the plural is distinguished from the singular; and the parts of verbs ending in —ed, —est, —eth, from their original. But when the examples are few, no such distinction is made, but may be easily observed.

5. The concordant words, except the first, are marked by the first letter a. b. c. &c.; and the mark — stands for several words above marked in Italics. Divine persons are noted by answerable capitals.

6. Even other words, especially names of divine persons, are often marked by one or more of their first letters, that the sense of the line might be more complete.
